Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. This is the last matter I am going to present to-day. I thank the gentlemen kindly for their patience and courtesy. You will at least give me credit for having confined myself to the questions under discussion; that I have not talked politics or tariff. I read from the report of the engineers, on page 5:

"4. The Kissimmee River has been under improvement since 1903 under a project which provides for a channel 3 feet deep and from 30 to 60 feet wide from the town of Kissimmee to Fort Bassenger. The limiting depth in this river is now about 2 feet. There has been expended on the project about $30,400.

"5. In his report on preliminary examination under the act of 1909, the district officer reports that three small steamboats drawing about 2 feet and 50 to 60 launches are in use on the river; that these boats can be operated at ordinary low stages of the water, but that navigation practically ceases during long-continued dry weather. He states that there appears to be about 10,000 tons of freight handled on the Kissimmee River and 30,000 tons in the town of Kissimmee."

On this creek in 1907 there were eight months of dry weather. In 1908 it was dry for five months, and as the gentleman from Illinois well suggested a few days ago, it ought to be insured against fire. [Laughter.]

Now, on page 15, I want to read a letter from G. F. Kribbs, dated at Kissimmee, Fla., March 27, 1909. It is as follows:

KISSIMMEE, FLA., March 27, 1909.

DEAR SIR: The tract of land I mentioned to you is the Fort Gardner lands, 25,339 acres, and is owned, by recent purchase, by E. W. Bowen & Co., Delphi, Ind. These lands lie between lakes Cypress, Hatcheneha, and Kissimmee, and on the east side of the Kissimmee River, and about 35 miles south of this place, the nearest shipping point.

At the present time they have our county surveyor engaged in running lines and staking it off into 40-acre lots for sale to settlers from the North and West. At the same time they are having levels established for a system of irrigation and drainage. The great bulk of these lands is admirably adapted to truck farming and will no doubt be rapidly taken up by actual settlers as soon as transportation facilities become adequate and permanent. The work now being done, and to be done, is with the reasonable expectation that the waterways will be improved, so as to give an all-the-year-round channel of 3 feet or more.

As you no doubt have learned by personal inspection, there are hundreds of thousands of acres of similar lands, comprising the Kissimmee Valley, lying ready for the plow when the time comes that its products can be sent to market with reasonable transportation facilities.

Very respectfully, yours,

G. F. KRIBBS,

(Formerly Rep. 28th Pa. Dist. in 52d and 53d Cong.)

Mr. J. M. BRAXTON,
United States Engineer Office, Jacksonville, Fla.

On that condition the people are going down to settle on a stream that is dry eight months out of the year.

Here is a proposition to sell these lands to settlers from the North and West, a real estate proposition, and if this improvement is not made the land can not be sold.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman what is the name of that river? I lost the name.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will find it in the first paragraph, beginning on line 3, on page 25 of the bill—the Kissimmee River.

Mr. DONOVAN. Did the gentleman say that eight months of the year this stream is dry, with no water in it?

Mr. FREAR. Those are the statistics here in the engineer's report.

Mr. DONOVAN. And this great Committee on Rivers and Harbors has appropriated $47,000 for that river?

Mr. FREAR. That is all—just $47,000.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then the committee is to be commended that it has not made it half a million dollars. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is true that there is very little water in portions of that river during several months of the year, but it is also true that there is a great deal of water in it during other months of the year. It is further true that the river runs a part of the way through a lake section, which will furnish plenty of water when this improvement is made. I do not say that it would furnish enough water then to navigate the stream the year around, for I do not think it would. There is a system of improvements, however, in contemplation * * *. That, however, is for the future; but at present the purpose is to give for several months in the year sufficient water to furnish navigation from Kissimmee down to Lake Okechobee. * * * There are 71,000 tons of commerce on this river now; but I thought the period of navigation was a little more than four months in the year, as the gentleman says.

Mr. FREAR. I take that from the report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Assuming that to be correct, if we have 71,000 tons of commerce there for four months in the year, we ought to double that amount of tonnage when we increase the period of navigation to eight months in the year.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HENSLEY. Is the gentleman from Florida familiar with the conditions there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Fairly so.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does the gentleman admit that this stream is dry as much as six months of the year?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; not dry. The water is too low for navigation several months of the year, but this improvement is expected to remedy that to quite an extent.

Mr. MANN. The item just preceding this is in reference to the Oklawaha River. I will ask the gentleman if that is not the most beautiful river in the world?

Mr. COX. Oh, no; the Tombigbee is.

Mr. SPARKMAN. So far as my knowledge extends, excepting two other rivers in my district, I can say it is the most beautiful river in the world.

Mr. MANN. I am prepared to say that that is the most beautiful river I ever heard of, but I would like to ask the gentleman further about the Kissimmee River—whether that is not the sweetest river in the world?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Judging from its name I should say yes.

Mr. BUTLER. When this improvement is made on the Oklawaha River, will it not destroy its beauty?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. I should think it would add to its beauty, if that is possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

And the Rivers and Harbors Committee with knowledge that this is a real-estate proposition to catch suckers "from the North and West" to settle on a stream dry eight months in the year, gets away with the goods. As the sheriff of my county once said of a cracksman who blew the safe and stole the owner's horse to carry away his swag, "Can you beat it?"

Motion to strike out rejected.

OKLAWAHA RIVER, FLA., $733,000.

(Doc. No. 514.)

This little river asks for the modest sum of $733,000, cash $175,000 and $12,000 annual maintenance, a total investment of three-quarters of a million dollars. Generous engineers have already spent $47,516 on this project. Edw. Burr, the autocrat of the Treasury vaults, says (on p. 3):

The first appropriation should be $175,000 with subsequent appropriations sufficient to complete the work (estimated cost, $733,000) in four years.

A pork rind by any other name would smell as sweet. Let the RECORD speak for itself. On March 21, while discussing another item, the following colloquy occurred with the chairman of the committee, during debate:

Mr. FREAR. There are items in this bill, Mr. Chairman, in which they have gone off a hundred miles from navigation for the purpose of bringing products to market. The gentleman from Florida has an instance of that, which was called to my attention yesterday, and there are others.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, what did the gentleman say the gentleman from Florida had?

Mr. FREAR. I said the gentleman from Florida had an instance of an appropriation of which he spoke yesterday, an appropriation of over $700,000, I believe, to bring products a distance of 100 miles—oranges, for instance, and things like that—down a small stream to the St. Johns River.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman refers to Ocklawaha River.

Mr. FREAR. I did not know before yesterday that it was in the gentleman's district.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman has about stated the fact.

Mr. FREAR. I desire to be correct. I am trying to state only facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired on this amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Oklawaha River item was reached in the bill on March 23 and the size of the appropriation, together with the character of this project, causes me to further insert from the RECORD:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Improving Oklawaha River, Fla., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 514, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $175,000."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this paragraph. I dislike to criticize this item, because it is in the State of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. SPARKMAN] and he has been exceptionally kind to us in his treatment of those who are making inquiries. The chairman of the committee referred to this item the other day and stated the facts to be substantially as I understand them. I think the item ought not to be carried in the bill for reasons which I will state.

As I understand it, the Oklawaha River is a stream about 94 miles long, which is to be dug out to an additional depth for the purpose of helping the shipping of oranges. There are two or three things about this project that are very interesting. I will make a brief statement about it.

This is a crooked river, 94 miles long, emptying into the St. Johns. The Government has expended to date on the river $47,516.36. The commerce reported is 100,000 tons, four-fifths of which is floating logs. The net commerce exclusive of logs is stated on page 10 of House Document 514, containing the engineer's report, to be 20,000 tons. On page 20 it is stated that there is no regular boat line. Providing a boat service of twice a week is guaranteed, the United States engineer in effect recommends the following Government expenditure:

Estimated cost of improvements	$733,000
In addition to amount expended of	47,516
Four years to build, interest 2 years, at 4 per cent	62,400
Government expense when complete	842,916
Annual cost, 4 per cent interest	33,716
Maintenance charge	12,000
Operation expense, including locks	15,000
Estimated annual expense to Government	60,716

Now, as to the benefits to come. The net boat commerce now is 20,000 tons. (This freight is on the lower river, not affected by the project.) The estimated commerce is entirely problematical. There is water power to be given to Kyle & Young. There will be freight from 4,000 acres when reclaimed by Kyle & Young, who are among the vigorous advocates of this scheme, but the extent of prospective freight is entirely speculative. This project is proposed in order to get competitive freight rates without, however, guaranteeing any additional water commerce. The present freight rates are rates that the State of Florida should regulate and lower, wherever justified by the State railway commission. The project has high political indorsement, as appears from exhibits attached to the report. In justice to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, let me say that it is not his. Now, there are one or two things here that do appear very interesting. I read from page 10 of this document:

"This river has been under improvement since 1891, when a project was adopted for clearing the river of obstructions so as to give a 4-foot channel depth at mean low water from the mouth to Leesburg, a distance of 94 miles. This project was modified in 1907 by providing for a channel 6 feet deep at mean low water from the mouth of the river to the head of Silver Springs Run. The total expenditures have been $47,516.36, about one-half having been used for maintenance."

Mr. Chairman, it is now proposed to expend in addition the sum of $733,000, largely for the purpose of reducing railway freight rates when bringing oranges to market. There is not a single boat line on the river, and the only assurance asked by the Government is that a boat line shall be established, no contributions from local interests toward this $733,000. The river is a crooked stream, nearly 100 miles long. Nothing floating there to-day except occasional little boats; that is to say, no regular boat line. We are advised 20,000 tons of freight, outside of the logs and lumber, can be shipped and has been shipped in the past and would be shipped in the future without any additional expenditure by the Government. So it seems to me there is no question that this appropriation should not be made. I speak of this with some hesitation because of my admiration for the way in which we have been treated by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; but I believe the proposition is without a particle of merit, while it involves an expenditure of practically three-quarters of a million dollars.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is somewhat mistaken as to the extent of the navigation on that river. I may say there are two stretches of the river: First, from the mouth, where it runs into the St. Johns, up to what is known as Silver Springs Run; second, from the mouth of Silver Springs Run to Lake Zora. Below the mouth of Silver Springs Run there is plenty of water for the purposes of commerce. This improvement is almost entirely for the stretch above the mouth of that run, something like 30 or 40 mile.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. FREAR. Does it not seem a pretty high amount to pay—nearly $20,000 a mile—for that particular part that needs to be improved—between 30 and 40 miles?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I could answer the gentleman by saying no, but that is not all. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the development of the country resulting from this improvement, extending as it does through that rich and beautiful lake region, will pay for itself many times over.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. How far is it, as the crow flies, from the mouth of the Silver Springs landing to the St. John River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Fifty-three miles. No; not as the crow flies; I think it is not more than half that.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Wisconsin gave the length of the stream to be improved as 94 miles. I wanted to arrive at how crooked it is. Is it a very crooked river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The length of river to be improved is less than that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is there any railroad transportation there to-day?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, yes; there are two railroads traversing the section.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

WHO IS BENEFITED BY THE OKLAWAHA PROJECT?

No disinterested man in his right senses will contend that the Oklawaha River $750,000 project will help a taxpayer or ultimate consumer in Apalachicola, Tallahassee, Tampa, or the Everglades. It will not save a farthing to nine hundred and ninety-nine taxpayers out of every thousand living in Florida. Nor will it save a single penny to a consumer from Maine to Texas or Chicago to San Francisco. Who is to benefit from this piece of arrant nonsense? The Government is about to spend $750,000 to canalize 30 miles of a crooked stream, at the rate of $25,000 per mile. It will probably exceed the engineers' estimates and cost $1,000,000 or more before it is completed.

Who is this improvement for? J. D. Young's 4,000-acre tract may be improved $200 to $300 per acre, an increase in value of $1,000,000. J. D. Young's new water power the Government is about to construct may be worth several hundred thousand more. But that all goes to J. D. Young—or does it not? Who else along this "improvement" is to be cared for on this crooked-creek project, and why?

Paraphrasing Mother Goose, who was wise in her day and generation compared with ourselves—

We have a crooked creek, that has a crooked name, and grabs a crooked million while in a crooked game; to make a crooked water power run up a crooked hill, it crooks your Uncle Samuel through a crooked river bill.

Before leaving this project I desire to again refer to the engineer's report. On page 25 of Document No. 514 is a very urgent letter, filed as an additional reason for the allowance of the $750,000 asked for this improvement, which includes the first year's maintenance of $12,000.

The Engineers Board, in order to clear its skirts apparently, attached the letter as an exhibit, the only one I have encountered of that character during my reading of a hundred reports or more, aside from the Kissimee River project. I only quote the first part of the letter because it gives voice to a great calamity brought about by any disapproval of Maj. Slattery's report upon this project which farther down in the correspondence we are assured is favored by Messrs. Kyle and Young. The remainder of the letter is too extended to be reprinted entire after having once appeared in full on page 25 of House Document No. 514:

UNITED STATES SENATE, March 26, 1913.

GENTLEMEN: In connection with your notice of March 11 regarding Maj. Slattery's report on the "Oklawaha River to Lake Dora," I would like to ask that you set a date for a hearing and arguments in this matter after April 7. I regard this as one of the most important improvements to be considered in Florida.

I believe it would be a great mistake, and little short of a calamity, to have Maj. Slattery's report disapproved and this improvement denied. I wish to be heard on it and to submit the views of others.

The view of others includes the disinterested expressions of Mr. Young, who has two letters printed asking the board to "reconsider their former conclusion." The Board of Engineers reconsidered, and the man, Young, who owns 4,000 acres of reclaimed lands along the river and gets a free water power (all on page 14 of the report), is happy. What do you think about it? Is it worth the price?

DENIED 15 MINUTES ON THE BILL.

Mr. Chairman, I trust I may be pardoned if I have dwelt too long on the character of these small projects. As stated at the outset of the discussion, only a hurried examination has been given by me of these items. I do not remember ever having seen or heard of an engineer's report until the bill was under discussion, with 9½ hours given to the committee to tell us what is contained in these 66 pages to make a pull of $43,000,000 on Uncle Sam's strong box, or $76,000,000 in all, counting new projects started. In a thoughtless moment I asked for 15 minutes in which to ask about this pork-barrel bill, of which I could learn nothing aside from a brief 10-page committee report.

That report gives more space to tug smokestacks on the Potomac River and to anchorage grounds than to any appropriation item. In fact, few projects are mentioned by name. After an extended discussion in the report about those smokestacks and anchorage grounds, it seemed the irony of fate to have both recommendations by the committee, so temperately made, struck out on points of order.

As shown by the RECORD, affairs of state required that the 9½ hours set aside for discussion of the bill should be devoted to the Panama Canal tolls and tariff question, so I found myself unable to get the 15 minutes in which to inquire about this $76,000,000 bill. A further reading of the committee report of seven pages contained a comforting assurance on page 7 that the committee had "given every possible care to the consideration of the bill, having devoted nearly 10 weeks to its active preparation and a much longer time in preliminary work, during which many hearings by Representatives and citizens" were held.

Upon inquiry I further learned that references to documents were inserted so the committee could conveniently refer to the report when answering casual inquiries, also that these documents were dry reading. I have not found them entirely so, and if more time had been afforded I feel sure the committee would not have so frequently chided me for lack of information. In fairness to the committee, I may add that sometimes when making inquiries I did not disclose all I knew of different items, because I found committee members were inclined to go to the opposite extreme.

At this stage of the discussion, Mr. Chairman, I pause to say I trust in the future to be better prepared, and wish to express thanks to many members who have spoken kindly of my vigorous although unsuccessful efforts to amend the bill.

With this brief apology, I shall leave the small apportionments of pork, so liberally scattered throughout the 66 pages of the bill, in order to turn attention to larger appropriations, and with my self-confessed handicap of unsophisticatedness, which has attracted frequent expressions of sympathy from committee members, I invite your attention to larger and more important grafts—in amounts, if not in principle.

REGULATING FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. Chairman, through the ingenious efforts of the engineer's office a newly discovered industry has become popular, because it affords a convenient chisel with which to break into the Treasury. It is called the "canalization of streams," and its possibilities run from the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers to the Trinity and Coosa Rivers in the South, not to omit the beautiful Oklawaha. This scheme of canalization also includes the intercoastal-waterway project, which is warranted to clean up all the cash in the Treasury, together with everything received from the income tax. All other efforts to raid the Treasury, with the possible exception of the Mississippi $275,000,000 project, are Lilliputian compared with this canalitis that has wrapped its coils around Uncle Sam through the skillful aid of the engineer's office.

Before I discuss this particular hallucination, indulged in under the fallacious pretense that it will reduce railway rates, I desire to briefly consider factors that to-day enter into the control of railway rates. I do this modestly and yet with confidence that principles are stated correctly. I also appreciate that abler men of the House have given much study to the subject. None of them, however, are found defending the canalization schemes contained in the rivers and harbors bill!

Repeatedly we were warned that opposition to these canals would place us among the opponents of the shipping trust and friendly to oppressive railway domination. Every scheme, no matter how visionary or extravagant, hides behind the coat tails of the engineers' department, and defends its existence with shouts against the railway bogy man. Any scheme of river improvement, however wasteful in its expenditures of public money and however useless in its purposes for actual navigation, finds itself immune because the railway "'ill catch you if you don't watch out." The railways were once a factor in legislative halls, State and National, but their lobbyists have disappeared, and their presidents, directors, and stockholders all doff their hats respectfully when they enter the sanctum of Uncle Samuel's railway policeman, the Interstate Commerce Commission. The greatest railway official in the country has not a tithe of the power to abstract money from the pockets of the people as has the brass-buttoned factotum who presides in the Army engineer's office.

RAILWAY LEGISLATION.

My own State was one of the first to adopt legislation for the control and regulation of railways. In both branches of the legislature I aided my colleague, ex-Speaker LENROOT, in that fight. Under the leadership of Wisconsin's senior Senator, LA FOLLETTE, we gained for Wisconsin one of the most comprehensive and far-reaching railway laws in the country.

During the struggle no favors were asked and none given. Every known weapon in the hands of the railways, from money to misrepresentation and vituperation, confronted the political fortunes of advocates of the bill. I digress to make this brief statement because of the insinuation made upon this floor that when we oppose vicious waste of money for idiotic canalization schemes we place ourselves under suspicion of being hooked up with railway interests. Such charges usually come from men who are ignorant of the truth or who are unduly urging some shipping trust's raid on the Treasury. I make no charges; neither will I be deterred from performing a plain duty in pointing out frauds contained within this bill. For a certificate of character as to my affiliations I refer you to the people of my own State, whose interests have never knowingly been misrepresented during the dozen years or more I have been intrusted with their keeping.

It would be unbecoming a new Member to criticize older Members who are given to catch-phrase utterances regarding water competition. I do say, however, that while water competition may, in rare cases, affect present railway rates, its chief purpose of iteration and reiteration in connection with this bill is to throw dust into the eyes of the public while pork-barrel burglars rifle the Treasury. Either that or special pleaders must confess ignorance of that of which they speak. I assume this statement will be met by personal animadversion, a usual response offered on the floor during this discussion, but I offer that observation for the study of fellow Members who are disposed to inquire whether a bludgeon or stuffed club is being wielded by those who are threatening railways with competitive water rates, to be financed by the Federal Treasury.

It is a familiar rule of law that railways are entitled to reasonable earnings for services rendered the public—and no more. It is equally true that reductions in railway earnings, directed by law, when tantamount to confiscation of property, can not be enforced because of the constitutional protection. It is also a matter of common knowledge that a noncompensatory rate at one or more points on the railway must be paid for or met by proportionately higher charges at other points in order that reasonable earnings may be maintained. I can not stop to split hairs on definitions, but am stating well-known principles governing railway transportation.

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES CONTROLLED BY LAW.

If these principles are correctly stated it follows that the Interstate Commerce Commission, under its authority given by Congress, may determine freight rates on interstate traffic and can enforce its regulations and orders even to the extent of preventing railways from raising rates at water competitive points or elsewhere unless the railway can show that its constitutional right has been invaded by compelling it to maintain insufficient rates. In other words, generally speaking, railways doing an interstate business can not raise such rates, when they have once been reduced, without showing that existing rates will not provide reasonable earnings. I quote from the act to regulate interstate commerce, as amended June 29, 1906:

SEC. 15. That the commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this Act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provision of this Act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this Act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this Act, to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged; and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation, to the extent to which the commission find the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed.

Progressive States throughout the country have extended this same authority to State commissions, and such commissions in their control of intrastate rates have substantially the same jurisdiction over State traffic as is exercised by the Federal commission over interstate rates. I trust I may be pardoned for injecting this elementary statement of commission jurisdiction into the discussion and hope to justify a brief digression from the bill's provision by pointing out the real remedy for unjust railway freight rates, fancied or real, and to show that it is not necessary to wait 41 years in Texas for the canalization of the Trinity River in order to get relief, if any relief is warranted. In view of the pathetic appeal over Trinity River's canal made before the Committee of the Whole House by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. HENRY], I insert at this point in my remarks the powers reserved by the Texas constitution to the people of Texas to control rates (sec. 2, art. 10), and also an extract from sections 2 and 11 of the railroad commission law of Texas:

CONSTITUTION OF THE STATE OF TEXAS.
(Art. 10.)

SEC. 2. Railroads heretofore constructed, or which may hereafter be constructed in this State, are hereby declared public highways and railroad companies common carriers. The legislature shall pass laws to regulate railroad freight and passenger tariffs, to correct abuses, and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in the rates of freight and passenger tariffs on the different railroads in this State, and enforce the same by adequate penalties, and to further accomplishment of these objects and purposes may provide and establish all requisite means and agencies invested with such powers as may be deemed adequate and advisable.

TEXAS RAILROAD COMMISSION LAW.

(Rev. Stat., 1895.)

(Art. 4562.)

SEC. 2. The commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to fix to each class or subdivision of freight a reasonable rate for each railroad subject to this act for the transportation of each of said classes and subdivisions.

SEC. 11. The commission shall make and establish reasonable rates for the transportation of passengers over each or all of the railroads subject hereto, which rates shall not exceed the rates fixed by law. The commission shall have power to prescribe reasonable rates, tolls, or charges for all other services performed by any railroad subject hereto.

I commend a study of these provisions to those gentlemen who so unsparingly criticized the exposure of the Trinity River canalization fraud.

OKLAWAHA RIVER V. A RAILROAD COMMISSION.

In like manner I quote from the railroad commission laws of Florida, sections 2888, 2893, and 2908.

The laws of Florida are especially efficacious, and now that they are cited here the citizens of that historic State will be enabled to secure the interposition of the State railroad commission. Then they can secure adoption of reasonable railway rates on the two systems that parallel or divide freight traffic with the hypothetical Oklawaha River commerce that is promised by an $800,000 Federal investment. The State railway commission may not be able to furnish J. D. Young free water power promised him at Government expense on page 19 of Document No. 514. The commission may even be so inconsiderate as to refuse to drain Young's 4,000-acre tract, but all citizens having just claims against the railways for exorbitant charges can secure instant relief without waiting 4 years or 40 years for a crazy canal scheme or for the political aid of any official, State or Federal.

I append the Florida laws for convenient reference in the hope that the Senators from that State may see the lack of necessity for this $800,000 raid upon the Federal Treasury and will exclude the obnoxious item if it is passed by the House:

LAWS RELATING TO RAILROAD COMMISSION OF STATE OF FLORIDA.

2888. Rates of tolls allowed to be charged by railroad companies: If any railroad, railroad company, or common carrier, organized or that may be hereafter organized or exist in this State under any act of incorporation or general law of this State now in force, or which may hereafter be enacted, or any railroad, railroad company, or common carrier, organized or which may be hereafter organized under the laws of any other State and doing business in this State, shall charge, collect, demand, or receive more than a fair or reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of passengers or freight of any description, or for the use and transportation of any railroad car upon its tracks or any of the branches thereof, or upon any railroad within this State which it has right, license, or permission to use, operate, or control, the same upon conviction thereof shall be dealt with as hereinafter provided for.

Providing any State fails to establish a strong State railway commission with power to control rates, the fault lies with the State, and the Federal Government ought not to be required to contribute toward the supposed needs of local shippers in an effort to create a fictitious water competition.

Practically all the strenuous arguments for a share in this $76,000,000 pork barrel have been urged upon us in order that the Government may finance some hairbrained scheme for creating water competition. The responsibility for unjust rates lies primarily with the State if it has failed to enact proper legislation under its constitutional power to do so. No railway freight rates can be raised unjustly to embarrass any community or any shipper of either State or interstate freight, providing the State exercises its powers and its proper function of control. And the State, unless controlled by railway influences, will afford relief in every instance. If controlled by the railways, the proper missionary work should be employed in cleaning out the State legislature rather than the United States Treasury.

FREIGHT RATES SHOULD BE EQUITABLE.

I will not cite authority for legislative control, because the Supreme Court decisions are familiar to every student of the subject, from the Illinois warehouse case and the Smith-Ames Nebraska case down through a long line of decisions to the present time. I desire, however, to suggest one further equitable proposition that must be considered with raids on the Treasury under the slogan of water competition. It is true that railways sometimes reduce their rates on certain traffic to meet water competition, often below the actual cost of carrying. Wherever the railways have competed for the traffic they have driven river competition out of business, excepting in rare cases, as I shall show by indisputable statistics when I reach that branch of the discussion. I wish to present one unanswerable proposition that has become clearly defined within the past few years, since the Federal and State commissions assumed a positive control of freight rates by public carriers. Adopting the rule that only reasonable earnings will be authorized by law, we are confronted with the proposition that when rates are reduced at water competitive points below the actual carrying charges, that the loss must be made up by overcharging shippers at noncompetitive points.

It does not benefit the shipper at an inland point, nor does it help the ultimate consumer, who eventually pays the freight, to have freight carried at a loss at some other point. Compared to any one shipper using water transportation for domestic traffic, a hundred or more are served by the railways, as will be shown by statistics I desire to submit. Artificial water competition may force railway rates down for a limited number of people affected by water competition, but 9 constituents out of every 10, on the average, of every Member upon this floor receive no benefit, direct or incidental, through this species of favoritism. On the contrary, the nine other unfortunate constituents are called upon to make good the railway losses occasioned by special favors to the one shipper at some river point. Adding insult to injury, the nine shippers are also called upon to foot the $76,000,000 bill which gives these special advantages to the one favored competitor. This is on the assumption that rates are lowered. As a matter of fact, not one scheme in a dozen, nor one dollar in a dozen so expended, has a particle of influence upon freight rates. In the exceptional case it may be pocketed by the favored shipper and benefit a subsidized shipping trust as objectionable as a railroad trust.

Where actual water traffic exists through natural causes it is idle to claim that the shipper is not entitled to his advantage, but with the Government and State empowered to regulate rates it is idle to contend that the Government should be made a goat to carry the load for any shipper.

Hereafter I shall submit statistics showing that wherever railway and water competition have met at interior points the railways have driven out water traffic excepting upon the Great Lakes and coal freight down the Ohio. Special conditions are found that distinguish this commerce from that commonly found at interior points.

I now come to the canalization schemes, which are worse by far than petty steals perpetrated by Scuppernong Creek or Kissimmee Creek, because gigantic in comparison. All the 25 projects in North Carolina combined, vicious as they are, only aggregate $1,507,075, and all the 21 direct appropriations for Florida, aside from the future pledged payments for the Oklawaha, only aggregate $845,200.

I call your attention first to a piece of pork found in the barrel which demands $10 to every dollar filched from the Treasury by Florida.

CHESAPEAKE & DELAWARE CANAL.

On page 14 of the bill appears an innocent item of $1,300,000 for the purchase of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. Referring to the committee report, page 4, we are informed this is a part of the intracoastal-waterway system from Boston to Key West. The canal is now owned by a private company and has 37,618 shares of stock outstanding, par value $50. The United States originally donated $450,000, and the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware $175,000, or $625,000 in all, approximately one-third of the entire capitalization. Private parties then built this 13-mile canal, using for the purpose $48,000 per mile of money donated as above stated. Here comes in the Engineers' department, brass buttons, blue maps, commercial estimates, and so forth.

These governmental employees have determined that the canal should be purchased, at a maximum cost of $2,514,200. They have figured it to the exact dollar. For a 12-foot channel they estimate that $8,000,000, a mere bagatelle, will buy the canal and dig it deeper than it is now. Here also comes in the superior sagacity of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, which says, page 5—

The committee fixed the maximum amount to be paid for the canal at $1,300,000.

Just as easy as falling off a log. The committee, having in mind the necessities of Murderkill Creek, Del., and Kissimmee Creek, Fla., saves Uncle Samuel $1,214,290, which the engineers would throw away. Not yet, but maybe. When this item was before the House on March 23, I stated:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I esteem it a great privilege that the committee has given me 10 minutes upon this item of $20,000,000 in this bill, and I trust the House will advise itself of the character of the item before it votes upon this canal. On page 86 of the intracoastal waterway report it is stated by the engineers (Doc. No. 391, 62d Cong.):

"In all earlier investigations the principal object in view with reference to this proposition was to provide the city of Baltimore a direct and safe outlet to the ocean. Naturally the pressure for the desired outlet has originated largely in Baltimore, and a satisfactory solution of the problem presented demanded that the outlet be made as direct as possible."

This, then, is a proposition from the city of Baltimore, and it expects to some day ask the Government to appropriate $20,000,000. Indirectly, on the face of the bill, it is a proposition for only $1,300,000; but $20,000,000 is the amount that is contemplated in the future, and the amount that will eventually be passed by this House if Baltimore's claims are recognized.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Not at this time. Later on, if I can get a little more time, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman has the wrong report.

Mr. FREAR. No; I think not. Says the report, as a reason for this $20,000,000 proposition:

"During the last five years many vessels and lives have been lost along the coast between Cape Charles and Cape Henlopen, between which points there is no harbor of refuge except the inadequate one at Chincoteague. Among the vessels so lost were 32 engaged in the coastwise trade which might have used the canal, if the same had been available and free, and which would in that way have avoided the dangers which caused their loss. The value of these vessels and their cargoes is not known, but the aggregate tonnage was about 22,600, and it may be assumed that there was lost with them not less than 12,000 tons of freight. Vessels of this class generally carry all that can be loaded upon them, and the above assumption is conservative."

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill does not now propose to appropriate $20,000,000. It proposes to appropriate, however, over $6,000,000, and together with the $450,000 which has been paid in this case it amounts to over $7,200,000. That is the proposition before us. But the one to which our attention is directed is the $20,000,000 appropriation that is contemplated in the future to make a deeper channel. That is for 25 feet.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. FREAR. Will you give me extra time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I trust the gentleman would like to be corrected.

Mr. FREAR. I would. But you propose eventually a 25-foot channel.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is no proposition of that kind before the House.

ENGINEERING PROJECTS CHANGE.

Mr. FREAR. Not at this particular time, but in the future, according to the engineers' estimates for a deeper channel. This is for only $7,200,000 at the present time, but the other will follow. I have estimated, Mr. Chairman, that in 100 years, at the rate of loss which has occurred, according to the engineers' report, of 12,000 tons in 5 years, it will amount to 60,000 tons, and considering only a $6,000,000 appropriation to be the limit, it will cost $100 to save every ton lost at sea during that period, which the Government will pay. However, the appropriations will be never ending. If it be the policy of the Government to give protection at an expense of $100 a ton for all loss, then this is a good proposition; but the project ought to be based upon something more substantial than such a statement.

On page 99 we read:

"The foreign trade carried in vessels not too deep to pass through the canal is estimated as follows: Steamers, 480 annually; tonnage, 1,589,938. The saving in time is therefore 320 days, and the cost of operating may be placed at not less than $150 per day, or the annual saving may be stated as $48,000. This does not include the saving in time for sailing vessels and barges."

At $150 per day—I am reading from page 99—the annual saving may be estimated at $48,000. This does not include the saving of time——

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman give me the date of that?

Mr. FREAR. These are statistics of what has gone through the canal.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the date of the engineers' report from which you are reading?

Mr. FREAR. It is 1912—Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. GOULDEN. I heard some one state that it was not the latest, and I am desirous of having that which is up to date.

Mr. FREAR. If they will only give me time I will take care of the proposition. That is what is before Congress now, although it is not proposed in this appropriation. Here is an appropriation of $7,200,000. Is that denied by the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. Where is it?

Mr. FREAR. I can not tell you, excepting that it appears in this engineers' report.

Mr. MADDEN. We are dealing with the bill.

Mr. FREAR. No; we are not. We are dealing with the future in this case. This is a 13-mile canal. We propose to put in $8,000,000 in the purchase of the canal after deducting that $1,300,000, which makes the canal cost at those figures here over $550,000 a mile.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do they deny that?

Mr. FREAR. They can not deny it.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman say from what report he is reading? That is what I want to find out.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman answer me what is proposed to be expended on this canal as it stands now?

Mr. MOORE. It is estimated by the engineers that the canal will cost over $8,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. That is all I have to say; that is the estimate per mile, based on $8,000,000.

Mr. MOORE. From what report are you reading?

Mr. FREAR. The engineers' report.

Mr. MOORE. Which one? There are three or four reports.

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield. The report is dated 1912. It is for $8,000,000. That is over $600,000 a mile for 13 miles, and it will be over $1,000,000 a mile when you get the depth for the deep-water vessels by spending $20,000,000.

ENGINEERS RECOMMEND $2,514,000.

Now, the thing that interests me, Mr. Chairman, is the abandon with which these engineers enter into their recommendations to purchase this canal for $2,514,000. That is their proposition. What do they know about the advisability of purchasing this canal more than Members of the House?

It was argued Saturday by one of the gentlemen who was discussing this question that we ought to have this canal for the purpose of carrying troops from Philadelphia to Baltimore. Think of the absurdity of that proposition. It would take a whole day by boat, when inside of two hours you could land them by rail.

Mr. Chairman, we have two or three propositions in connection with this that are interesting. We have had experience in canals. We built a $7,000,000 canal in Illinois a short time ago, and I will ask anybody who expected to be benefited by the canal where one dollar was saved to the people of Iowa or elsewhere by reason of that project, in freight rates or otherwise. The Hennepin Canal is not used. It has been practically abandoned, except by pleasure boats, according to the statistics.

We have the Erie Canal for our guidance. That canal in 1880 shipped 4,108,581 tons of freight. At that time—in 1880—the Erie Canal shipped 18 per cent of the total freight that was shipped by boat and rail from New York to Buffalo. In 1906, after 16 years, the freight tonnage on the Erie Canal had dropped to 2,383,481 tons. The canal was then shipping only 3 per cent of the freight, according to statistics. In 1912, only two years ago, the total freight shipped on the Erie Canal was 1,798,069 tons, or 2 per cent of the total water and rail freight shipped between New York and Buffalo. And $130,000,000 is proposed now, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] said the other day, to improve that canal so as to make reduced freight charges.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is right; bring it up to date. It is $130,000,000, and is considered a good investment by the people of my State.

Mr. FREAR. I understand. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have had some experience in canals. We are proposing to spend $8,000,000 for this Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. We had the Hennepin Canal, and after spending $7,000,000 it is found of no value for any purpose. We have had the Portage Canal. We have had canals all over the country. But to-day they have little bearing upon the freight rates of the country, because we have passed laws now that give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to determine when railroad rates are unreasonable. Railroad freight rates can not be raised when they have once been reduced to water-competitive rates without showing present rates would otherwise be confiscatory. That being so, this canal project must be purely for the purpose of accommodating the city of Baltimore.

We have, throughout this bill and elsewhere, as was cited by the gentleman from Boston, projects where local interests contribute part of the cost. Boston appropriated $9,000,000 for the improvement at that port. If we use $8,000,000 for this project, let Baltimore appropriate $4,000,000, which will be one-half the total expense. Why should not that condition be imposed before we pay one dollar toward this project?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] does not know anything about this proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Thank you. [Laughter.]

My only justification for devoting so much time to this proposition is because of the deceitful character of such items, and I say this without reflection upon the committee, which has followed precedent in its presentation of only a small part of the cost at this time. It was stated during the discussion of the item that I was not reading from the latest report. I read from a Government Engineers' report, Document 391, Sixty-second Congress, page 23, which gives the plan then under consideration at $9,910,210 estimated cost of construction; purchase price, $2,514,290; previously paid, $450,000, or a total of $12,874,500, but 50 per cent additional can safely be added to these figures, judging by the inaccuracy of engineers' estimates to which I can refer for authority. The new proposal is for a 12-foot channel instead of a 25-foot channel proposed for the larger figure, but one will be merged into the other after the project has once been started. I shall give my reasons for this statement when discussing the next item and now submit a newspaper clipping published in the Philadelphia Inquirer on the day following this discussion:

OWNERS WILL UNLOAD FOR $2,600,000.

THE INQUIRER BUREAU, POST BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., March 24.

That the owners of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal will not sell their holdings to the Government for the price fixed in the rivers and harbors bill and approved by the House of Representatives was flatly stated by witnesses before the Senate Committee on Coast and Insular Survey to-day.

Representatives of the owners of the canal, including Walter Hall, the secretary and treasurer of the company, testified that the value of their holdings aggregated $4,591,412. They were willing to sell to the Government for $2,600,000, or $100,000 more than the value fixed by the Army engineers, but under no circumstances, they said, would they be willing to sell for $1,300,000, the amount of the appropriation in the rivers and harbors bill.

The committee will have another hearing next week. An attempt will be made to increase the purchase price when the rivers and harbors bill comes before the Senate. A fair figure will be fixed by condemnation proceedings in case the owners of the canal are not willing to accept a compromise figure.

I quote further from the RECORD, showing the disposition by the committee of objections to this item:

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 77.

So the motion to strike out the paragraph was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FREAR. That is to be added at the conclusion of the paragraph.

"'Provided, however, That prior to the expenditure of any money by the Government toward the purchase or improvement of this canal there shall be paid into the United States Treasury, subject to the order of the Secretary of War, by the States, municipalities, or communities specially interested, the sum of $10,000,000, which is one-half of the full estimated cost of such canal project, and the Secretary of War shall use the proceeds so contributed in equal proportion with those appropriated, or hereafter to be appropriated, by the Government toward the completion of such project; all moneys so contributed and remaining unexpended after the completion of such project shall be set aside for a fund for the continued maintenance of such canal, after first deducting the sum therefrom of $450,000, heretofore contributed by the Government toward the construction of such canal, together with interest thereon at 4 per cent from the date of such contribution; and all money so refunded to the Government shall be deposited in the United States Treasury for general purposes.'"

At this point I offer a brief colloquy taken from the RECORD to show the importance attached to this $20,000,000 project by the committee:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Very well, if I can not have any more time, I must stop.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more. This is very interesting to all of us.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Make it 10 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to 10 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. This is a large proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I object. I have no objection to five minutes, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes.

TECHNICAL PARLIAMENTARY TACTICS.

Following the offering of the amendment the RECORD shows this colloquy:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, before addressing myself strictly to the amendment, I wish to state that in yesterday's paper appears a statement to the effect that the effort to enlighten the House upon the propositions contained in this bill are purely filibustering, and that the attempt——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman discussing anything outside of this bill and amendments to the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is not in order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FREAR. It is directly on this bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman should rise to a question of personal privilege if he wishes to make that statement. That is more nearly stating his position than anything else.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not yet been out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not following the course of the debate and can not determine. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. FREAR. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in response to that that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] said on Saturday in pure courtesy:

"So far as the committee is concerned, we have no quarrel with the gentleman, except this: That if he picks out a few items and they are voted down, it is unfair then for him to say, 'Now, these are samples, and the bill is full of them.' I think the gentleman ought to continue to present his propositions, so that the committee can give whatever explanation it has of them, so that the country may judge whether or not this bill is framed upon proper lines."

We all concede that that is a fair statement, coming from the gentleman from Mississippi, and it is with that in mind I am addressing myself to a few of the objectionable features which, in my judgment, exists in the bill.

Here is a proposition which directly affects Philadelphia and Baltimore—practically no other city at present, at any rate—and it is no more than fair, inasmuch as the Government is to contribute generously to this canal, that these communities should adopt the same plan as was adopted in Massachusetts and in other cases that you have pointed out in your report. In other words, the city of Philadelphia and the city of Baltimore should give such contribution as may be fair toward the construction of the canal, which it is agreed will cost $7,200,000, and that is only part of a large intracostal system.

This proposition to dig a deep channel has been laughed at here. It is said that this is not to be a 35-foot canal. Not now; but we know that it is impossible to carry shipping through that canal, for it will be navigable only by small boats. A further question arises. Here is a proposition to pay $1,300,000 for the canal. Who owns the canal, and who owns the stock and the bonds? Who is to get this money? We know nothing about it. The engineers recommend over $2,000,000. It would seem that if Baltimore is interested and if Philadelphia is interested it is their duty to contribute at least one-half of the cost.

I do not care to discuss this proposition further, Mr. Chairman; I do not care to add to it. My position is made plain.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has asked the question, "Who owns the canal?" I will answer, it is owned by a private company, the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co.

Mr. FREAR. Who are the stockholders?

Mr. MOORE. We have not been able to ascertain, but the list of stockholders is supposed to embrace about 500 people. It is a company that has been doing business since 1824. A tonnage in the hundreds of thousands has been going through ever since its beginning. It now pays interest on its bonds at 4 per cent.

Mr. FREAR. What is the value of the stock?

Mr. MOORE. It is practically worthless. I want the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to know and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] to know that about 1,000,000 tons of traffic went through that canal last year. The company does not want to sell its property, so far as we know.

A BANKRUPT CANAL PROPOSITION.

In addition to Mr. MOORE's statement that the stock is worthless, Chairman SPARKMAN of the committee declared, in his address before the House March 17, that the bonds are only worth 50 cents on the dollar. This is the canal value for which engineers recommended we pay $2,600,000.

I quote from the chairman's statement:

The Secretary of War, under the provision of the rivers and harbors bill of 1909, which called for a survey of an intracoastal system from Boston, Mass., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., including the section between the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, caused an examination to be made of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and other possible routes across the intervening land, reports on which are embodied in House Document No. 391, Sixty-first Congress, second session, and in House Document No. 196, Sixty-third Congress, first session. In both of these reports the purchase of the canal was recommended, and in the last the cost, including the purchase of the existing canal, together with its enlargement to a depth of 12 feet, was placed at $8,000,000, the purchase price of the canal being fixed at $2,514,290, as was recommended by the Agnus Commission. The committee, however, not agreeing with the engineers as to the amount that should be paid for the canal, but believing its actual value to be much less than the sum fixed by them, have authorized its purchase at a cost not to exceed $1,300,000, which it is believed is all it is worth.

It will be noted by anyone who has examined or who will take the trouble to examine the Agnus report that the officers of the canal company gave but little information to the members of the commission as to the value of the canal or the price at which its owners would be willing to sell. It was ascertained, however, that the canal was bonded at something like $2,600,000, which bonds were valued at about 50 cents on the dollar. Furthermore, the Government, it seems, originally contributed to the construction of the canal $450,000, for which it yet holds stock in the company. This stock, together with stock dividends received, now aggregate 14,625 shares, of the par value of $50, or $731,250 in all; besides, the canal company has owed the Government something like $51,187.50 since 1877 for cash dividends, which, together with interest, amounts now to about $150,000. It further appears that no dividends have been paid to anyone subsequent to that date.

I wish also to say that according to the Agnus report there seem to be some engineering difficulties in the way of any further deepening of the present canal; difficulties that would not, it is deemed, be encountered along the Sassafras route, and which might make it advisable to adopt this latter route. I only throw this out as a suggestion, for we would doubtless in the end follow whatever recommendations the engineers may make; at least that is the usual course.

My amendment was rejected, of course. I will not presume to discuss this important item further, but it is one of the most objectionable projects in a bill that is brimming over with vicious measures.

CANALIZATION RUN RIOT.

The Atlantic Intracoastal Waterways publication furnishes some definite figures, which I insert for convenient reference, with comments thereon hereafter:

The following are the sections of the Atlantic intracoastal waterway route as now recommended by the engineers:

St. Johns River, Fla., to Fernandina, Fla., 7 feet depth (Work under way.)	$251,726.75
Fernandina, Fla., to Savannah River, Ga., 7 feet depth (Work under way.)	195,000.00
Savannah River, Ga., to Charleston Harbor, S. C., 7 feet depth (Work partly under way.)	427,400.00
Charleston Harbor, S. C., to Winyah Bay, S. C., 7 feet depth (Construction recommended.)	1,227,800.00
Winyah Bay, S. C., to Little River, S. C., 7 feet depth (Construction recommended.)	5,677,800.00
Little River, S. C., to Cape Fear, N. C., 7 feet depth (Construction recommended.)	3,724,219.00
Cape Fear, N. C., to Beaufort, N. C., 7 feet depth (Construction recommended.)	2,872,111.00
Total southern section Atlantic intracoastal waterway, St. Johns River, Fla., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., in round numbers	14,400,000.00
Beaufort Inlet, N. C., to Norfolk, Va., 12 feet depth (Project approved by Congress; work partly completed. Chesapeake and Albermarle Canal purchased. Much of the route lies in Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds, natural waterways requiring no improvement.)	5,400,000.00
Norfolk, Va., to head of Chesapeake Bay, Md. (Natural waterway requiring no improvement.)
Chesapeake Bay to Delaware River, 12 feet depth (Recommended for immediate action, including purchase or condemnation of existing Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.)	10,514,290.00
Delaware City, Del., to Bordentown, N. J. Route follows channel of the Delaware River, for which present depth is sufficient over the entire distance, assuming a 12 feet project.
Bordentown, N. J., to South Amboy, N. J., 12 feet depth (Immediate construction recommended.)	20,000,000.00
South Amboy, N. J., to New York Bay (and thence to to Hudson River and Long Island Sound). (Natural waterways requiring no improvement for a 12 feet project.)
Total northern section Atlantic intracoastal waterway, Beaufort Inlet, N. C., to New York Bay, in round numbers	36,000,000.00
Total cost, Atlantic intracoastal waterway, as recommended by the Army engineers	50,400,000.00

POSTPONED PROJECTS.

The following sections of the intracoastal waterway route have been surveyed by the Army engineers, and, while not adversely reported, consideration is postponed until more progress has been made on the foregoing sections:

Key West, Fla., to Indian River, Fla., 7 feet depth	$2,127,950.00
Indian River, Fla., to St. Johns River, Fla., 7 feet depth	2,491,056.03
Fisher's Island Sound, Conn., to Narragansett Bay, R. I., 18 feet depth	12,322,000.00
Narragansett Bay, R. I., to Boston Harbor, Mass., 18 feet depth	29,590,000.00
Total for projects named	96,931,006.03

The foregoing estimate of some $97,000,000 for an intracoastal waterways system is an initial step toward a useless coast canal estimated to cost several hundred millions. For this tremendous waste we may again thank our Army engineer bureau in proposing an idiotic, impracticable scheme of little commercial value. When will we shake off the supine attitude which permits Congress to be led by the nose by an autocratic, irresponsible Army officer?

For some mysterious reason the average engineer's report with its "now you see it and now you don't" estimates, reestimates, and other data is scattered through 5,000 pages of the 1913 report and through innumerable House documents. I am not finding fault; far be it for a layman to question the obsolete and red-tape methods of this bureau. It does take time and patience to dig out the facts, however, and it was impressed firmly on my mind when I took up this pamphlet entitled "The Atlantic Intercoastal Waterway," published by the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, 1914, in the City of Brotherly Love. The attractively illustrated booklet gives a summary of estimates to St. Johns River made by engineers for this waterway craze totaling $50,400,000. The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal proposition at a 12-foot depth is estimated at $10,514,200. A proposed canal across the State of New Jersey, somewhere near the familiar confines of Mattawan Bay, is thrown in with the comprehensive statement from the engineers that "immediate construction recommended" $20,000,000? Why worry over the eight-months dry Kissimmee with its measly $47,000? In short, why worry over anything until the Federal Treasury like the Kissimmee runs dry?

NORFOLK-BEAUFORT CANAL.

On the bottom of page 17 of the bill appears two lines with the figures $800,000 after the words, "continuing improvement." I have run through 278 pages of Document 391 and only digress long enough to note that the $800,000 appropriation is part of a $5,400,000 project undertaken by the Government for sending gasoline launches and small craft from Norfolk to Beaufort.

As I have before stated during the discussion, I am not unfamiliar with Albemarle Bay, having once lived on the narrow strip of sand that divides the muddy sound from the ocean. From personal experience I can confirm the engineer's statement at Newbegun Creek that Albemarle Sound varies several feet with the wind.

On page 116 of the same document we are further informed as to this $5,400,000 project that mariners on Albemarle Sound "are diverted from the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal by dread of storms and a desire to follow the more sheltered route." This statement by the engineers, together with the declaration that Albemarle Sound varies in height 4 feet with wind, is offered to show the unmitigated folly of dredging out Albemarle Sound in order to provide a safe route for small craft. Neither is there a ghost of a chance for the hapless sailor caught in the sound excepting to scoot for the shore. Anchors will not hold in the mud, nor will craft find shelter on the sound in the constant heavy winds that blow across the sands with undiminished force, leaving the sound as unsafe and far more treacherous than the ocean. This is not my individual experience alone. I have the confirming statement of one of the best waterway experts in the country who has frequently traveled over the sound and who declares the canal project to be a piece of engineerial folly. On page 117 of the report the intelligent engineer discourses on the possible interruption of traffic "by the forces of an enemy," but he solemnly concludes that "the injury to traffic by this route that could be done by hostile vessels lying off shore is believed to be negligible." The traffic is certain to be negligible in any event, and the greatest enemy that can interfere is the Federal Treasurer when he locks the vaults against these pork-barrel grafts. Speaking of an enemy, I may add I never left the sands for eight months, during which time I traveled for a distance of nearly a hundred miles up and down the coast from New Inlet to the vicinity of Cape Henry. Of thousands of vessels seen from the shore never once did a craft of 50 tons burden attempt to make an inlet. The engineer's statement is correct; no enemy will ever seriously injure traffic.

CURTIS BAY CHANNEL, MD., $61,850 (FULL EXPENSE, $123,700).
(Doc. No. 37.)

This is a proposal to have the Government deepen a channel near Baltimore, a proposal which it is predicted will follow with the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. I will not discuss the project further than to say it is another proposal to help out some fertilizing and coal companies. I quote from pages 4 and 5:

Curtis Bay is a tidal estuary of the Patapsco River, with which it is connected at a point 3½ miles below the corporate limits of Baltimore City. Although the bay is situated beyond the city limits, the establishments upon its banks have their offices in the city, and the commerce has been considered a part of that of Baltimore. The mean range of tide is a little over 1 foot.

The first preliminary examination of this locality was made in 1890 (see Report of the Chief of Engineers, 1891, p. 1243), and resulted in the adoption of a project July 15, 1892, for a channel 27 feet deep at mean low water, with a bottom width of 150 feet, at an estimated cost of $85,000. Forty thousand dollars was appropriated for this work, and its expenditure resulted in a channel 25 feet deep and 150 feet wide, with an additional depth of 2 feet for a width of 70 feet along the axis, for a distance of about 2½ miles from the Patapsco River channel toward the coal piers in the harbor. This project was never completed, having been changed by the river and harbor act of June 13, 1902, which provided for a channel 250 feet wide and 30 feet deep, at an estimated cost of $196,000. This is the present project, and was completed November 30, 1903.

There has been appropriated to date under both projects for this channel $260,000. The expenditures to June 30, 1912, amounted to $255,000, of which $22,316.64 was for maintenance.

The controlling depth in Chesapeake Bay and Patapsco River is 35 feet, and those now interested in the further improvement of the channel into Curtis Bay desire that it be deepened so as to admit any vessel entering Baltimore Harbor.

The commercial statistics by water, both import and export, for 1911 are given as follows:

2,047,382 tons of coal, at $3 per ton	$6,142,146
25,000 tons of fertilizer, at $20 per ton	500,000
35,000 tons of fertilizer, at $25 per ton	875,000
70,000 tons of fertilizer, at $17.50 per ton	1,225,000
100,000 tons of naval fuel oil, at $20 per ton	2,000,000
80,000 tons of chemicals, at $14 per ton	1,120,000

Discussing this project, a scratch-my-back letter, in reply to an apparent suggestion, is contributed as affording an unanswerable argument for its passage. By deepening the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal naval vessels can also get to Philadelphia without encountering the storms that Capt. John Smith once weathered in his tiny craft. It would also be a military asset in time of war. I quote:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 20, 1912.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I beg to inform you that I am this day addressing a letter to the chairman of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, urging the passage of bill H. R. 20829, introduced by you, for the deepening of the Curtis Bay Channel, Baltimore Harbor.

The proposed improvements of this channel would not only benefit the commerce of Baltimore and the State of Maryland, but would be of the greatest value to the Navy, in admitting the latest type naval colliers to the railroad piers for loading coal. Curtis Bay might easily become an invaluable military asset in time of war. This department is therefore pleased to cooperate with you in urging the above-mentioned bill.

Faithfully, yours,
BEEKMAN WINTHROP,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Amendment to strike out rejected.

The second item of page 18 of the bill is $300,000 for continuing improvement of a harbor of refuge at Cape Lookout, N. C. Information comes to me that this is a project requiring the construction of a railway 14 miles long and that the total expenditure will run into several million dollars. On the other hand, the value of such harbor is claimed to be negligible. I do not express any opinion beyond saying that after reading many engineers' reports, a few of which have been presented, I will say that the judgment of Army engineers as to the majority of items in this pork barrel should be strongly corroborated before launching our Government Treasury into the creeks, sounds, and canals they have recommended for improvement.

CANALIZATION NIGHTMARES.

Passing over other items connected with the intercoastal waterway project of $97,000,000, I will briefly take up one or two river canalization frauds. The Oklawaha River $800,000 proposition has been briefly presented. Another mythical scheme is the Coosa River, Ga., which only gets $65,000, page 23 of the bill. Nothing startling appears in this item until we read the engineer's report and learn that a project for the canalization of this river started in 1890, 24 years ago, was modified in 1892, and provides for 23 locks and dams of the Coosa River, Ga., at an estimated cost of $5,106,422. By June 30, 1909, the intelligent engineers' office had expended $401,372 and had only 4 per cent of the project completed. This was doing fairly well for the engineers' office, which had been so many years on the job. Like a thrifty storekeeper, the engineer took an accounting of 19 years' progress, and in 1909 the waiting public was informed by his report:

On account of the numerous rapids, this part of the river has never been navigable. As yet (after 19 years) no benefit has been derived from this improvement, and its value is entirely dependent on the completion of the entire system.

Amount required for the completion of the existing project is $6,059,913. This statement, issued 19 years after the project had been started, shows an expenditure of $401.372 and a jump in estimates of $953,481. And after 19 years the stream was as worthless as ever. Taking up the intelligent Engineers Report for 1913 I find, on page 2134, that—a small commerce in the rafting of logs and square timber can only be carried on when the river is about 12 feet above low water, and no reliable estimate of its value can be ascertained.

And this is the progress made in 24 years with a worthless project. Congress appropriates $65,000 in 1914, although the engineer says, page 2133:

No appropriation is recommended for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

At the rate of progress made on the Coosa River we may reasonably expect navigation will be opened up by the year 2014, provided the engineers do not disgust Congress with this stupid, reckless, senseless, wasteful proposition. It will take a century to complete and it will be as valuable as a toy balloon when the $6,000,000—or, possibly, $10,000,000—has been sunk in the Coosa River. In addressing ourselves to the indictment of criminal incompetence in the handling of this project we may well ask, Who is to blame?

TRINITY RIVER, TEX., $10,000,000.

Passing over scores of questionable propositions, we come to another canalization scheme that is on a par with the idiotic Coosa River project: Improving Trinity River, Tex., $205,000. Mr. Chairman, I have no pride of original discovery, although the items heretofore criticized in the bill have been based upon personal investigation as to their merits. The assault upon this item by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] is so clear, lucid, and uncontrovertible that I quote his remarks before the committee:

The Clerk read as follows:

"Improving Brazos River, Tex.: Continuing improvement from Old Washington to Waco by the construction of locks and dams heretofore authorized, $200,000; continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work from Velasco to Old Washington, $25,000; in all, $225,000."

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am going to discuss only one of these propositions. I am acquainted with the Brazos River; I am acquainted with the Trinity River. * * * Mr. Chairman, when I come into this House and see men bring in a proposition to navigate the Brazos and Trinity Rivers, I am surprised, for going back and forth over the State, on horseback and in wagon, I ford these rivers, and time and again I have seen them standing in holes below the points called the head of navigation. In Dallas for months they could not get enough water to supply the actual necessities of the city, and they hauled water there by rail.

Mr. FREAR. Is not that a case like the Kissimmee River in Florida, where it ought to be insured against fire?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes; and if this were the only proposition, it would not be so bad. In 1902 they started on the present Trinity River project. It must be a great deal better project than the Pedee and Lumber Rivers, for they have just started on the Pedee and the Lumber Rivers; and it must be better than Matawan Creek, in New Jersey, on which they appropriate $137,000 for the purpose of deepening a canal for 2 miles, because they have just started on Matawan Creek; and it must be away yonder better than the Kissimmee Creek in Florida. I take it that the Trinity River is a very good proposition, looked at from the standpoint of the engineers. They started on this project in 1902. They estimated that the entire project would cost $4,000,000, and up to this time they have expended $2,229,142.93. The original estimate by these scientific engineers, who are supposed to make no mistakes, was that it would cost $4,000,000 to complete the project. They have worked on it since 1902—12 years—and now they say it will take 100 to 130 per cent more than that, or practically $10,000,000, to complete the project; and these scientific men say that the appropriations which have been made so far by Congress for the Trinity River "seem to indicate an intention to provide locks and dams." [Laughter.] They have expended $2,000,000 so far. This year we have $205,000 in the bill to continue that work which is going to take $8,000,000 to complete—$200,000 a year. How long will it take to complete that project? Why, it will take 41 years longer, according to the way this committee is proceeding, according to the way these engineers are proceeding; and they have already been working on it for 12 years. That makes 53 years from the time they started; and they are going to expend two and a half times as much as the original estimate. My friend from Dallas does not certainly expect to navigate the Trinity River. He may have some children who will navigate it, but, according to the showing made by these engineers, at the present rate of progress this gentleman who is now in Congress getting these appropriations, and every other Member of Congress interested in the Trinity River, will be gathered to his fathers before the first boat goes up the river. They say "no commerce can go on it until it is completely canalized."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

RED RIVER PROJECT.

If time permitted I would call your attention to the piece of brazen engineering folly entitled "improving the Brazos River, Tex.," a project that also reaches into the millions of dollars and carries $225,000 in this pork-barrel bill. It is only a duplication of the Trinity River $10,000,000 travesty appearing on the same page 35 of the bill. An investigation by any disinterested Member will disclose the waste on these two rivers. But scores of similar items, which I have not time to enumerate, appear among these canalization schemes. Take, for illustration, the next item after the Trinity River appropriation, which appropriates $25,000 for the Red River, Ark., all found on page 35 of the bill.

On page 839, Army Engineer's Report, 1913, we are informed this project was begun May 23, 1828. Engineers modified and remodified plans in 1872, 1878, and 1879. After $1,106,831.90 had been expended we learn on page 839 that a new project was begun, which has been since modified in 1884, 1888, 1894, 1902, and 1905. On page 841 it is stated $1,556,857.98 has been expended, but I am advised that on the entire Red River project $2,548,377 has been expended, and the cost of maintenance, according to the engineer, page 840, is $100,000 a year. Different estimates appear as to the actual commerce served aside from logs and timber, which would be floated anyway, but I have an unofficial statement before me which says in 1908 the transportation of 841 tons of freight cost the Government $93 a ton in maintenance alone. This does not consider interest on the investment. Eight different engineering projects, costing, with accrued interest, several millions of dollars, has resulted in the engineer's conclusion: "The nature of the commerce has changed greatly since the improvement began, as the higher class freights have been directed to the railroads." And we idiotically continue to improve Red and Coosa Rivers.

ERIE CANAL.

(Not a Government enterprise.)

Mr. Chairman, I would be content to leave the subject of canals but for the fact that two or three illustrations may be cited to show the absolute folly of building canals to compete for freight traffic, as shown by past experiences. Anyone but a Rip Van Winkle Army engineer would be informed on the subject. As I have before stated, the Erie Canal in 1880 shipped 4,108,581 tons of freight; Erie Canal in 1906 shipped 2,383,481 tons of freight; Erie Canal in 1912 shipped 1,798,069 tons of freight; Erie Canal in 1880 shipped 18 per cent of total rail and water freight; Erie Canal in 1906 shipped 3 per cent of total rail and water freight; Erie Canal in 1912 shipped 2 per cent of total rail and water freight.

The startling significance of these figures is disclosed by the fact that on the greatest strictly commercial canal in the country the freight traffic fell nearly 60 per cent within 32 years, and from 18 per cent of the total in 1880 it was driven out of business by the railways, so that in 1912 the railways were carrying 98 per cent of all freight traffic. This occurs on a waterway connecting the Great Lakes, the only real inland waterway in the country.

HENNEPIN CANAL.

This canal was built by the Government across a part of the State of Illinois. It was predicted that a saving of from fifteen to twenty million dollars in freight charges annually would be saved by its construction. Begun in 1892 it was finished in 1909, five years ago, at a cost of $7,401,100. The result appears in this colloquy in the House on March 24:

Mr. FREAR. I wish to make this brief remark that the Hennepin Canal in Illinois, which cost the Government $7,401,100, shipped 699 tons of freight in 1907, and the traffic on the canal is now practically all gone. I offer this as a suggestion in regard to the future of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, for which we are about to appropriate an equal amount.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman, for the benefit of himself, however, that the Hennepin Canal, as I have been recently informed, is commencing to do quite a business.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The traffic on the Hennepin Canal doubled in the last year.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the traffic on the Hennepin Canal would have to be very large in order to double itself.

Mr. FREAR. It was only 699 tons in 1907.

In 1912 the appropriations reached $7,612,795.44, Engineer's Report, 1913, page 2414, and carried 42,828 tons of freight. Now listen to this engineering folly's report of cost to the Government, page 906, of the 1913 report:

The 42,828 tons of freight averaged less than 50 miles, page 906.

Operating expenses to June 30, 1913, fiscal year	$204,499.83
Year's interest on $7,612,795 at 4 per cent	304,511.00

42,828 tons freight carried 50 miles at $12 a ton.

Can any greater piece of engineering folly be found than with this canal, which, after five years' nursing by the Government, with an original outlay of over seven and a half million dollars, carried freight, including salt and grain, at an average cost to the Government of $12 a ton for a 50-mile haul?

IMPROVING OHIO RIVER, $5,000,000.

Total estimated expenditure, $64,000,000.

I will only refer to one more canal project, which, however, appears to me to be a crowning act of national foolishness, more particularly because of the great amount of Government funds squandered and wasted, rather than because it differs in principle from the reckless extravagance which characterizes a score of others.

On this important proposition I offer a portion of the RECORD argument when this item was before the House on March 24:

Mr. SPARKMAN. If I can not procure it by unanimous consent, then I move that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this proposition is not what appears in the bill, and I presume the Members are familiar with it. The proposition here, of course, is to appropriate only $5,000,000 appearing in this one paragraph. However, the estimate for this improvement is $64,000,000, and it is for the construction of 63 locks. I would like to insert as a part of my remarks some statistics as to Lock 37, showing the amount of shipments through this canal at the present time. The subject has been under discussion in the general debate, not by myself, but by others, and I offer for that purpose page 2534 (Engineers' Report, 1913) and the other page referring to the lock. I ask unanimous consent to make them a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin to extend his remarks as indicated?

There was no objection.

The statistics referred to are as follows:

"5. Operating and care of Lock and Dam No. 37, Ohio River: This work was placed under the appropriation for operating and care provided by section 4 of the act approved July 5, 1884, as amended and reenacted by section 6 of the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1909, on January 1, 1911.

"The dam was raised and lowered five times between August 18 and December 7, 1912, being a total of 54 days.

"During this period 346 lockages were made for the passing of 655 crafts.

"The amount expended during the fiscal year was $31,372.86, and the total expenditures, exclusive of outstanding liabilities, amounted to $49,561.90."

Mr. FREAR. It has been shown here, in reference to this project, first, that the total appropriation will need to be $64,000,000. As I understand from the engineer's report, that is the estimate, and I have the page here in regard to it.

I am not acquainted with the exact amount that has been expended up to this time, but I think it is something like $9,000,000 to March, 1913. Most of the traffic on this stream goes down the Ohio River proper. The project here is to expend $64,000,000 in establishing 63 locks, and they are to be used during certain seasons of the year for carrying on additional traffic.

It has been shown, as evidence of what the traffic is in this particular lock, that 957,781 tons passed through in 1912. That carried all the traffic which went through the Ohio River at that time by means of a lock. Of that, coal amounted to 799,888 tons, leaving a balance of about 157,000 tons. They could have shipped the coal by rail at Government expense, and after deducting the average freight charges for coal, it means $23 a ton average expense to the Government for maintaining the canal. That is the average cost to the Government, as shown by this lock.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind it is a grave question whether or not the Government ought to continue a matter of this kind on the strength of the engineer's report, just as has been done on the Trinity River, on the Coosa River, and elsewhere.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the entire paragraph from line 8 down to and including line 16, page 39.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. The purpose of this amendment is in order that more consideration may be given by the engineers to the proposition, and we may learn whether it is going to be beneficial to the country. There is nothing so far presented which shows that this is to be of any aid toward an increased commerce by the use of these locks, and that is the vital question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] read some figures that I was unable to follow in detail, evidently undertaking to draw a conclusion from the fact that only a portion of the tonnage of the river went through a given lock. If he knew anything about that river he would not have made such a statement. The reason why most of the tonnage on the river now does not show as going through a particular lock is because the river is not entirely locked and dammed.

Therefore, in order to get through to the point of destination a great deal of the traffic on the river is held at its origin waiting for a rise and must take advantage of the rise and keep on the crest of it going on down. The actual traffic on the river last year for nine months from April 1 until December 31 was 8,618,396 short tons, and during the same period nearly 4,000,000 passengers were carried.

Mr. FREAR. I have given more than that, according to the engineer's figures.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman has given more than that, it makes all the more remarkable his speech and motion. That tonnage amounts in value to $71,000,000 for nine months of a year, and the gentleman thinks that the Ohio River, a stream 1,000 miles long, is unworthy of improvement! To that state of mind I know of no way of making an appeal. All one can do is to ignore it.

Mr. FREAR. The preceding paragraph makes provisions for the improvement of the Ohio River. This is about the canal system.

I have quoted the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, who is the champion of this piece of monumental extravagance on the part of the Government. He demands $5,000,000 in the bill and $64,000,000 in all for this canalization scheme. The item just read in the bill of $350,900 for improvement of open-channel work on the Ohio River was passed without opposition. Over four-fifths of the Ohio River traffic passes down the open river and always will, because it is more expeditious and inexpensive. To avoid a few days' delay, 54 days in which Lock 37 was in use, the Government is to pay out $64,000,000 for a paralleling canal.

What is this expenditure for? Will it increase traffic? For 10 months in the year the canal was not used at Lock 37. The river carried over four-fifths of all the freight. It could have carried 10 times as much. Then, what is the purpose of this $64,000,000 expenditure for a canal?

I wish to first submit a statement from page 280 of the Commissioner of Corporations report for 1912, in which it is conceded that duplication occurs because shipments at one port are included in receipts at another.

SEC. 8. TOTAL TRAFFIC OF THE OHIO RIVER AND TRIBUTARIES.

It is impossible to make an accurate statement of the total commerce of the Ohio River and its tributaries. A board of engineers of the United States Army appointed to examine the Ohio River estimated the total of both through and local shipments on the main stream at approximately 9,000,000 tons annually. Detailed statistics of freight traffic by steamers and coal companies compiled by the United States engineers, however, show a total movement on the Ohio River in 1905 of 13,163,656 tons and in 1906 of 11,427,784 tons. A third estimate, based on the following table of freight shipments and receipts at the various ports on the Ohio River (excluding tributaries), indicates a movement in 1905 of 13,955,928 tons. In presenting this table to the board of engineers referred to above, the secretary of the Ohio Valley Improvement Association, by whom much of the data was compiled, says:

"It is proper to say that, in the opinion of the writer, who has been connected for 30 years with the traffic of the Ohio River, some of the figures show that they are exaggerated, while others are underestimated. It is further the belief of the undersigned that the figures as a whole can be considered as fairly accurate."

It appears that some duplication is involved, shipments at one port being also included as receipts at another.

From the foregoing engineers' statement, which is "exaggerated" and includes duplications, the following fact appears: In 1905 traffic on the Ohio amounted to 13,163,656 tons. In 1906 it had fallen to 11,427,784 tons, and in 1912, according to the statistics offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], it had fallen to 8,618,396 tons. Due to ice, dry season, and other causes, freight is held back temporarily, but the total river traffic has fallen away in eight years approximately 35 per cent, or more than one-third. Between 80 and 90 per cent is coal shipped in barges. As before shown, the total traffic through Lock 37 in 1912 was 957,781 tons, of which 800,000 lacking 12 tons was coal. That this ratio is preserved along the canal I offer the following table for five years, from page 272 of the Commissioner of Corporation's Report for 1909:

Articles.	1903	1904	1905	1906	1907
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
Coal	1,203,790	1,498,216	1,592,487	1,154,991	1,476,980
Iron ore, and manufactures	24,923	34,543	43,571	35,720	25,341
Lumber	71,092	45,851	49,112	21,012	27,046
Miscellaneous merchandise	67,309	36,043	76,818	72,158	78,342
Other articles	96,720	40,959	67,171	60,023	44,690
Total	1,463,834	1,655,612	1,829,159	1,343,904	1,652,399

This table is from the home city of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, who knows all that is to be known on the subject and modestly admits it. From the table it appears the traffic in 1906 and 1907 combined was less than for 1903 and 1904 and averaged less than in 1905. Interesting also is the fact that, aside from coal tonnage, only a small amount, comparatively, of iron ore, lumber, and other freight went through this canal located at the Ohio Falls, the most difficult point to navigate on the Ohio River, and yet for many years the canal has carried all the traffic offered, which did not go by the open river. Where or how traffic is to be stimulated so as to justify an expenditure of $64,000,000 or 64 cents is not shown by the gentleman from Kentucky, by the engineers' reports, or by any data obtainable.

From page 249 of the Report of the Commissioner of Corporations of 1909, we read:

In its course of 967 miles between Pittsburgh and Cairo, * * * coal and products of the forest and farm, * * * with manufactured articles, furnish the chief articles of traffic. * * * As already mentioned, one of the most striking features of river traffic, however, is the absence of through lines that were formerly in operation. River commerce at present, with the exception of the traffic in coal and, to a lesser degree, that in lumber, is confined principally to local movements over comparatively short routes. Coal, lumber, sand, and gravel are the chief commodities moving in barge-load lots. Most of the other articles transported are carried in mixed cargoes on packet boats. Logs and lumber are largely rafted. Along the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo there are 40 railroad crossings.

And for such traffic is $64,000,000 to be expended by the Government in the construction of a canal?

That the railways have driven traffic from the Ohio River, excepting coal shipments down the open river, is supported by the statistics at hand. I am also advised that stock in the largest company plying between Louisville and Cincinnati has fallen from a high premium to less than par, in all, a loss of over 80 per cent on the dollar, within the last 25 years. I admit my own unfamiliarity with the Ohio River; but I can not question statements from those who do know, when supported by Government reports. Facts which are undenied but avoided by the defenders of this monstrous extravagance.

The Ohio River is practically the only stream that has preserved any of its commerce. Coal and iron, its chief tonnage, are at the source. Nine-tenths of that commerce is coal, and most of it goes downstream to-day as it did 50 years ago, with practically nothing going upstream. At low water coal is temporarily held, but with a diminishing river traffic no justification is offered for this $64,000,000, wild-eyed engineering scheme of canalization which has been foisted onto the National Treasury. If the Ohio River traffic has decreased 35 per cent, or half that amount in eight years, it will continue to decrease, so that by the estimated time in which the 63 locks are to be built traffic on the Ohio may amount to less than one-half its present volume. Except for a limited time when open river traffic is interrupted, the bulk of traffic will continue to seek quicker and cheaper shipments by way of the open river, as it has for 50 years past.

Accepting as a basis for an estimate the violent presumption that traffic will continue through the canal up to its present volume, we have the following facts upon which to base the future annual cost to the Government when this $64,000,000 canal is completed, in handling its present tonnage:

Investment, $64,000,000, at 4 per cent interest annually	$2,560,000
Depreciation, $64,000,000, at 4 per cent interest annually	2,560,000
Maintenance, 1,000 miles, and 63 locks, at $50,000, approximately	3,000,000
Total annual expense	8,120,000

Maintenance, based on actual cost of Lock 37 for 1912.
No account of interest on investment prior to completion.

Tonnage, Lock 37, for 1912	957,000
Tonnage, 800,000 coal, by railway freight, at $2.50 a ton	2,400,000
Tonnage, 157,000, miscellaneous freight, at $36 a ton	5,600,000

TONNAGE OF LOUISVILLE & PORTLAND CANAL.

[Report of Commissioner of Corporations for 1909.]

I quote from table 207, page 272 (taken from Chief Engineer's Report of 1907, p. 1805): Ohio River traffic at Louisville in 1907, latest data available, shows total freight carried separately as follows:

	Tons.
Louisville & Portland Canal	1,079,534
Open river	453,792
Total	1,533,326
Canal traffic, coal	953,187
Canal miscellaneous freight—ore, lumber, etc	126,345

Traffic is largely short-haul freight (p. 249, Comm. Corp. Rept.).

953,187 tons coal, at $2.50 per ton, shipped by rail and paid for by the Government	$2,382,967
126,345 miscellaneous freight, at $45 per ton, approximately	5,737,033

Estimating the canalization cost at $64,000,000, when finished, the traffic through the canal, if maintained at its present average, would cost the Government as follows:

After allowing freight charges on coal by rail the entire length of the Ohio River and paying freight therefor out of the Government Treasury, all the miscellaneous freight shipped through Lock 37 near the upper Ohio River, if maintained throughout the canal, would cost the Government $36 per ton, and at Louisville $45 per ton. This average freight charge along the 63-lock canal shows what Army engineers have led us to adopt. Who is there, aside from the gentleman from Kentucky, to defend this criminal waste of money? Any analysis of Ohio River traffic affords but one conclusion—our $64,000,000 canalization scheme is indefensible and should be abandoned. Five million dollars appropriated toward its construction can be saved by the defeat of this 1914 bill.

These estimates are approximate and of value only so far as they tend to demonstrate the rank absurdity of the Ohio canalization opium dream. Long before the 63 locks are completed and $64,000,000 is spent Uncle Samuel will recover from this folly into which he has been led by the Army Engineer Corps, with the result that the incomplete Ohio Canal and all its wasted millions will be abandoned like a last year's bird's nest. Uncontradicted testimony on this prediction is offered by our experience with the Trinity River Canal, which takes 41 years more to complete, the Coosa River Canal, with 100 years yet to complete, and many other wasteful impracticable schemes which will never float a ton of freight during this generation, on projects that are never to be completed.

MISSOURI RIVER, $2,000,000.

Improvement between Kansas City and mouth of the River.

I am opposed to this appropriation, Mr. Chairman, and before giving my reasons for taking that position I quote from the RECORD of March 26 to show the spirit of one whose pork is endangered by honest impersonal criticism:

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] a few moments ago stated that the commerce on the Missouri River last year was 5,000 tons.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. No; the gentleman would not yield to me.

Mr. FREAR. I just want to correct the gentleman in his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, this is the only time that I have taken during the consideration of this bill, and I can not yield. I do not know where the gentleman got his figures, but he got them some place, I presume.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? He has stated them incorrectly.

Mr. BOOHER. No; I have the figures of the commerce on the Missouri River for the last year, and it is astonishing that if the gentleman was hunting for the facts in the case he did not go to the people who could give him the information, and give it to him correctly.

* * * * * * *

Yet the gentleman from Wisconsin would take away every dollar to improve the Mississippi River. I can not imagine why he would do so.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to let me explain?

Mr. BOOHER. No; the gentleman has occupied three or four days explaining, and he has not done it yet and never can explain. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Yes, I can. I have got the records.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, he wants to destroy the commerce of the Ohio River. He would take the commerce away from that great river that supplies the West with coal and compel us to pay double for every ton of coal that we burn every winter, because it is floated down the Ohio River. Oh, yes; destroy water competition, destroy all the transportation upon all of the canals and the rivers of the country and see where the freight rates of this country will go. The gentleman's constituents might be called upon to pay a part of it. It might be possible that up there in a country where there is no river and where he never saw one large enough to swim a sunfish that would do. Perhaps he is opposed to this because he does not like water. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

And so an amendment to strike out an item of $5,000,000 for the Ohio River, to which only 15 minutes discussion by the House was permitted, was rejected.

A NAVIGABLE RIVER MINUS BOATS.

I like to quote the arguments in support of projects in order to learn on what theory of business honesty we are asked to support this pernicious bill. The remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] are illuminating, if not instructive. After 10 years' service in the House, an old Member, he refuses to permit a correction of his incorrect statements, although I could not reply because of the 15 minutes' time limit. It is a situation worthy of thoughtful consideration.

The personal allusion would be overlooked, but I am moved to a reply because it bears directly on the pork barrel.

"Up in the country" where I live there is a river which is large enough to float a sunfish, a river I saw every day of my life for many years. It is the St. Croix River, which separates two great States, and is over 200 miles long from its source to where it empties into the Mississippi. The Mississippi River also flows for 100 miles past my district. For the last 30 miles the St. Croix varies from a half mile to 2 miles in width, and opposite my own home it is nearly a mile wide and deep enough to float the largest steamboats that ever ran on the Mississippi River. Thirty-five years ago, I well remember, the river was covered with a fleet of steamboats and rafts. Thirty years ago, even after the river was paralleled by railroads, the river traffic was still heavy, and a dozen rafts were frequently towed down the river past my home in a single day, carrying more commerce in tonnage and of greater value within 24 hours than all the traffic on the Missouri River between Kansas City and the mouth of the river during 1912, excepting, of course, the stone and dirt carried by Government boats for river improvements, which constitutes practically all the "commerce" on the river.

Traffic has left the St. Croix. The timberlands have been cut off and whereas the largest boats that ever ran the Mississippi can run up the river to my home city 365 days in the year, when no ice interferes, with a greater average width of river, better average stage of water, and less current than can be found on the Missouri, yet, aside from an occasional excursion steamer, the boats are gone. Three branches of a great railway system center at that point and three other railways center at a city 6 miles up the river. A fine navigable river, better than the Missouri the year round, is practically abandoned except by pleasure boats and an occasional towboat. Yes; the St. Croix is large enough to swim sunfish. It can afford navigation to many thousands of people in Minnesota and Wisconsin who live in the cities and villages that extend along its shores, but the traffic goes by rail, just as it goes by rail along both banks of the Missouri, and always will. I append a statement of tonnage on the lower Missouri River. From Sioux City to the mouth of the Missouri the principal traffic consists of sand and stone, especially at Kansas City. There is also a small movement of grain and general merchandise in local packet steamers and a small amount of rafted lumber. The following table shows the traffic from 1899 to 1906:

[Report of Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army, 1907, pp. 1600-1601.]

Of the total tonnage, only 34,332 is of merchandise, or less than 15 per cent of the total. This does not account for duplications, which necessarily occur in securing this data, because shipments and receipts, we are told, are counted at each port. Another fact is important to note: That all long-trade packets have been driven from the river for 10 years past. Also another important fact: That this data covers all traffic from Sioux City, Iowa, which is twice as far from the mouth of the Missouri as Kansas City. The upper part of the Missouri beyond Kansas City is cared for by separate appropriations in the bill amounting to $300,000. The objection to a $2,000,000 appropriation for Kansas City is on the ground of wasteful extravagance. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] also submitted a statement of tonnage on the river which may be above as well as below Kansas City for all that is disclosed. This annual appropriation of $2,000,000 is for the 400 miles of the lower Missouri, or at the rate of $5,000 a mile, in round numbers, for the year 1912.

Mr. BORLAND's statement to the House follows:

Mr. BORLAND. On March 3 I received the following letter from the secretary of the Kansas City Missouri River Navigation Co.:

"Replying to your favor of the 27th, regarding classification of tonnage moved by our line last season.

"Generally speaking, we handle an unusual percentage of high-class tonnage for a river line. During the seasons of 1912 and 1913 more than 50 per cent of all tonnage handled was third class and higher. This percentage of high-class freight will naturally be reduced as our volume of freight increases, but we do not anticipate any material reduction of percentage until such a time as our total freight exceeds 25,000 tons.

"An approximate division of last season's tonnage is as follows:

	Tons.
High-class merchandise (dry goods, pianos, etc.)	5,000
Groceries and drugs	800
Hardware	1,200
Lumber, cement, etc	60
Produce, hay, and feed	140
Grain	2,675
Miscellaneous	125

FREIGHT COSTS UNITED STATES $200 PER TON.

At the rate of $2,000,000 a year, this would average $200 a ton, providing all this freight is carried below Kansas City. The appropriation is a heavy item, and I have therefore continued my investigation and find on page 3449, Engineers' Report, 1913, a statement of commercial statistics on the Missouri, from Kansas City to the mouth. Seven little steamboats and three gasoline launches, with a total tonnage of 655, carried all the traffic with five barges in 1912. Deducting sand and gravel and railroad ties, 2 items of the 18 items mentioned, leaves 13,016 tons of "commerce," which cost the Government $154 a ton. This method of estimating expense has been questioned, however.

The project that Uncle Sam has undertaken to improve, according to the Engineers' report, page 933, states $20,000,000 is to be spent on this project, adopted in 1912, for improvement of 400 miles of the Missouri River below Kansas City, $7,227,935 has already been expended (p. 932). Four hundred miles of river, costing $27,227,935, will average approximately $70,000 a mile. Computing interest at 4 per cent, amounts to over $1,000,000 annual interest charge. To this should be added a maintenance charge of a half million dollars annually—all for 13,016 tons of freight, as follows: Grain, 3,696; iron and steel, 1,404; live stock, 2,006; other tonnage, miscellaneous. And this is to cost the Government $1,500,000 annually. The St. Croix is large enough to accommodate sunfish, or even whales, but only goldfish appear to thrive in the muddy Missouri.

I will not encroach further on the kindness of the committee in discussing the Missouri River beyond offering a suggestion to those gentlemen who are demanding such a heavy toll from the Government, professedly to reduce freight rates. You will never reduce freight rates a farthing on the Missouri railways by this expenditure of $20,000,000 on the lower Missouri. The attempt to create fictitious navigation on the river is a piece of monumental folly which excites the derision of every old river captain on the Mississippi or on any other western river. As well attempt to supplement your boot straps with a golden chain when attempting to pull yourself away from the ground. I offer a certain method of immediate reductions in rates of which you may avail yourselves if your claims are just.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION LAW OF STATE OF MISSOURI (P. 28).

SEC. 47. Rates and service to be fixed by commission.—Whenever the commission shall be of opinion, after a hearing had upon its own motion or upon complaint, that the rates, fares, or charges demanded, exacted, charged, or collected by any common carrier, railroad corporation, or street railroad corporation for the transportation of persons or property within the State, or that the regulations or practices of such common carrier, railroad corporation, or street railroad corporation affecting such rates are unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential, or in anywise in violation of any provision of law, so that the maximum rates, fares, or charges chargeable by any such common carrier, railroad corporation, or street railroad corporation are insufficient to yield reasonable compensation for the service rendered and are unjust and unreasonable, the commission shall, with due regard among other things to a reasonable average return upon the value of the property actually used in the public service and to the necessity of making reservation out of income for surplus and contingencies, determine the just and reasonable rates, fares, and charges to be thereafter observed and in force as the maximum to be charged for the service to be performed, notwithstanding that a higher rate, fare, or charge has been heretofore authorized by statute, and shall fix the same by order to be served upon all common carriers, railroad corporations, or street railroad corporations by whom such rates, fares, and charges are thereafter to be observed * * *.

DIFFERENT TRANSPORTATION METHODS.

Mr. Chairman, although the steamboats that once covered our western rivers have been driven off the streams and have gone into the junk pile, it would be hazardous to predict that at some future day the inland waters of America may not again carry some small traffic in cheap, heavy, slow-moving freight. In order to do so, however, some different means of transportation will have to be devised for river use than that which has been discarded, and, further, to become an actuality, it must be in spite of, rather than through the agency of, an archaic Army engineer's bureau. In criticizing the bureau I am voicing a common complaint against a system rather than against members of the Engineer Corps. For years the Engineer Bureau has been the laughing stock of practical hard-headed river men. Efforts to spend the money we have shoveled into its hands have caused it to place as many officers as laborers on some projects; nor is this more absurd than taking a steamboat a hundred miles from the Minnesota River down to Lake Pepin on the Mississippi to pull out a single snag reported at the head of the lake. Junketing trips in which friends are entertained at the expense of Uncle Samuel become water joy rides according to authentic information. For all this prodigal waste and unrestricted loose administration of Government business, employees are not alone blamable. They are part of the bureaucratic system which has been fastened upon us by our own action—by congressional sanction because of a power we have delegated to that department which permits it to allow or disallow some pet harbor or river project. It is a wasteful system, unrestricted in its responsibilities, for which Congress is primarily to blame.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Upper Mississippi	$1,500,000
Near St. Louis, 205 miles	1,000,000
Lower Mississippi	7,000,000
Mississippi River, 1914	9,500,000

This enormous appropriation in one year for one river, it should be understood, is a continuing appropriation.

We have poured enough wealth into the Mississippi to build four National Capitol buildings or construct practically all the public buildings at Washington. Over $100,000,000 of Government money has been washed away by this one stream, of which $14,000,000 has been spent on the 205 miles between the mouth of the Missouri and the mouth of the Ohio, or at the rate of $70,000 per mile in round numbers; $76,909,505 has been spent on the lower Mississippi and the remainder on the upper part of the river.

I realize the utter futility of attempting to stop this item or to reduce the $9,500,000 a single dollar, and yet I owe it to myself and to the House to give reasons why the present headlong rush of millions into this and other rivers should be stopped. If my investigations are of any service now or hereafter in calling attention to the criminal prodigality with which we are robbing the Treasury for no good purpose I shall be satisfied. In order to ascertain the trend of commerce on the Mississippi in recent years I append two or three tables which can be understood in their application without a diagram. From page 285, Report of the Commissioner of Corporations, 1909, I quote:

The Census Report on Transportation by Water in 1906 shows shipments on the upper Mississippi of 595,885 tons and receipts of 597,025 tons, excluding logs and rafts. The greater part of the traffic included was stone, sand, etc. Table 220, on the succeeding page, summarizes the available statistics of traffic on the upper Mississippi.

From page 286 of the same report I quote:

TONNAGE STATISTICS DUPLICATED.

The foregoing statistics are a revelation as to methods of ascertainment of tonnage which for some unaccountable reason totals the shipments and receipts in order to ascertain a grand total. In other words, 363,859 tons of stone and sand shipped shows up in the adjoining column as 363,503 tons received. It is the same tonnage and why should it be duplicated? The variation in other amounts is larger, but the item of coal, which is 20,000 tons, in each instance shows but one column can rightfully be considered in ascertaining actual tonnage carried. Deducting the stone, sand, and so forth, from the receipts, it shows a total carriage of coal, cement, lime, and so forth, of 233,522 tons. However, this, too, is misleading, because no through steamboat traffic now exists and this tonnage may only be carried a few miles in each case. In the Hennepin Canal traffic it was ascertained tonnage averaged 50 miles. Nothing enlightens us here, but stone and sand can be floated down the river as it has been for 50 years without the aid of engineering projects. Deducting stone and sand, we find the Government is paying $1,500,000 for carrying 233,522 tons of coal and miscellaneous freight at distances which may not average 100 miles, or at the rate of more than $6 a ton. We further note that while raft boats have decreased from 42 to 20, pleasure boats have increased to 125, and Government boats just hold their own. The upper-river traffic is fast disappearing.

I next offer a statement from the same Government authority, page 294:

Section 11. River commerce at St. Louis.

St. Louis is the converging point for traffic from the upper and lower Mississippi, the Missouri, the Illinois, and to some small extent from the Ohio, the Cumberland, and the Tennessee Rivers. The traffic by river at St. Louis was formerly, even as late as 1890, of much greater importance than at present. Table 226 shows the receipts and shipments at St. Louis from 1890 to 1906. It will be noted that traffic from the Ohio River fell off after 1890, but at present represents about one-half of the entire river receipts. This consists almost wholly of coal from the Pittsburgh district. The receipts from both the upper and the lower Mississippi have also fallen off to a considerable extent. The decline in river traffic is still more clearly shown by comparing it with the total rail traffic for each of the years. The river shipments from St. Louis have also declined steadily. The traffic to the upper Mississippi and Illinois Rivers, although small, nevertheless shows a slight tendency to increase. On the other hand, the shipments to the lower Mississippi have fallen to less than 7 per cent of the shipments in 1890.

This is a remarkable statement in view of the fact that $100,000,000 has been spent in improving navigation during the last 25 or 30 years.

It is further interesting to note that with all of this vast expenditure of money the proportionate river traffic in 16 years has fallen from 8 per cent of the total water and rail tonnage to less than 1 per cent, a tragic tale of a lost fleet, together with $100,000,000 of good Government money.

A LONESOME RIVER.

The tale of the lonesome river in 1906 is here related, taken from page 295 of the same Government report:

[1] Corrected.

The last data is for 1906, eight years ago. All information is to the effect that the decrease has steadily continued in the Mississippi and that all attempts to secure data on the entire river are fruitless and inaccurate because of the duplications which were specifically pointed out in the upper Mississippi tables.

BILLS THE GOVERNMENT HAS PAID.

No weather barometer more accurately measures the pressure of air than does St. Louis in the falling off of navigation in the Mississippi Valley. I have been unable to get exact information as to navigation in 1912 compared to 1906, but all indications point to a continued gradual loss. Neither have I been able to ascertain Government appropriations for the Mississippi system from 1890 to 1913, inclusive, but as the appropriations have been rapidly growing in recent years it is safe to say that $75,000,000 of the total $107,000,000 has been spent on the Mississippi and lower Missouri during that period. Assuming that navigation has held its own since 1906, a violent assumption, an interesting story is related by the table quoted, which reads as follows:

APPROPRIATIONS 23 YEARS APPROXIMATE $75,000,000.

St. Louis River traffic.

	Missouri.	Upper Mississippi.	Lower Mississippi.	Total river.	Total rail.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
1890	31,385	151,507	765,880	1,265,855	15,240,141
Approximate loss for 16 years	80%	55%	81%	66%	.....

This table shows that after all this tremendous artificial stimulation by Government appropriations, amounting to $1 for every man, woman, and child in the country, on the average, during that period, the Missouri traffic shows 80 per cent loss, the upper Mississippi 55 per cent loss, the lower Mississippi 81 per cent loss, and the total river tonnage a loss of two-thirds within 16 years. To use the fish simile of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER], this is a disastrous return for the planting of $75,000,000 worth of gold fish during the period. And this 1914 bill carries projects for a like amount wasted, criminally wasted, for political ends, and justified by an incompetent and overreaching engineering bureau.

RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

We are informed that the disguise is now to be thrown off. A new theory to justify wasteful expenditures has been devised. Navigation has almost vanished. It is no longer a word to conjure by, and so the country is hearing a new call to arms, with its slogan "Reclamation."

Far be it from me to measure individual judgment with technical Army engineers or interested parties who paint highly colored pictures for Presidents and lesser officials on junketing trips.

The reclamation of the Mississippi is to be embarked upon by these same willing Army engineers, who estimate it will cost $275,000,000 to harness both banks of the Mississippi River for a distance of 1,000 miles, to the mouth of the river. Experienced rivermen with whom I have talked, and who know every foot of the river, laugh at this new evidence of stupendous engineering folly, which proposes to spend $275,000 per mile. Who is right? I will not trespass on the time of the committee further than to make a brief criticism, based on common sense, an unknown factor with Government engineers when embarking on the Oklawaha, Coosa, Kissimmee, Trinity, and other valueless engineering schemes.

Sane men, with knowledge of the tremendous visionary plan approved for the Mississippi River, declare that no reclamation can ever be moderately successful, and that $275,000,000 will not make any more lasting impression on the Mississippi River as a whole than the $100,000,000 already thrown into the river. A few favored localities may be temporarily benefitted, but no State in the Mississippi Valley could be prevailed upon to contribute one-half of the expense proposed to be incurred along its own borders, because the proposition is chimerical and the slight proportionate benefits are local and largely for private interests. Army engineers do not frighten the paymaster by estimating the expense of a temporary Mississippi levee construction at a billion dollars, but this is no extravagant figure, according to rivermen familiar with the Mississippi River and its varying moods.

Presidents and public officials are accustomed to view the river when it slumbers. As well judge danger from a raging drunken outlaw armed to the teeth, by viewing him asleep and bereft of arms. The Mississippi River varies 70 feet in height at Vicksburg. It stretches out for miles in width along its turbulent course. At flood time it is a mighty rushing wall of water 70 feet in depth and reaching miles in width. The reclamation project proposes to cope with the Creator by harnessing this irresistible flood, made up by three of the greatest flood rivers in the world, the upper Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Ohio. Scores of other flood streams empty into the great rushing Father of Waters that has irresistibly swept down to the sea for thousands of centuries, and will continue to do so, unharnessed and unimpeded, for all time to come. All the temporary obstructions that can be raised by puny hands of man will be swept away, in his own time, by this raging drunken outlaw. Addle-pated engineers may waste millions of dollars of Government money in seeking to change its course. They may undermine the cities of Memphis, Vicksburg, and other cities with a criminal disregard for the consequences of their acts and the rights of citizens along its borders. To guide the Mississippi may be possible in places, although often disastrous in its consequences; to attempt to harness it from the Ohio to the Gulf, with a thousand miles and more on either side subject to flood action, is to invite the pity of an overruling Providence. Engineers may dig the Panama Canal, a wonderful feat of engineering; they may be able to canalize the Rocky Mountains, using glacier and artesian waters with which to moisten the locks, in an effort to force Jim Hill to reduce Great Northern Railway rates by visionary water competition; they may institute any number of nonsensical canalization schemes until Uncle Sam's strong box reaches the same low-water level they are seeking to obviate elsewhere, but they will never harness the Mississippi.

WASTE.

The cost of experimentation is limitless. Army engineers have committed the Government to other visionary projects admitted by the committee to total $305,000,000. In the present bill $39,000,000 is offered in new projects, of which $33,000,000 is saddled on to future Congresses; Government engineers have approved $92,000,000 in other new projects, according to the committee's report, which await the next tapping of the Federal till; the present bill provides for the survey of 120 new projects which only await the approval of this bureaucratic Engineer Corps, and which may create another hundred millions burden; next year the engineers may be required to survey the Scuppernong Creek, N. C., in order to provide a 35-foot channel for fertilizer factories that must compete with the new 35-foot channel projected this year for Wilmington, N. C. What a spectacle for the innocent taxpayers of the country whose attention is kept riveted on a new currency revision or free Panama Canal tolls. When Uncle Sam wakes up to the financial drunken orgie now occurring under the fostering care of his Army Engineer Corps he will rage as loud and long as the Father of Waters at flood time, and the most stupendous piece of incompetent engineering and legislative folly which he will denounce in no uncertain terms will be the Mississippi reclamation scheme. Even Chairman SPARKMAN, of the committee, found his seat too hot on the safety valve, when he warned the House of an impending explosion in his address March 17. Mr. SPARKMAN said:

But what of the cost? That is another pertinent question. Of course it is difficult, Mr. Chairman, for us to determine now or for anyone to say just what the future cost will be, and yet I believe that unless we are to embark upon some wild scheme of waterway improvement not connected—or, if connected at all, very remotely—with legitimate river and harbor work—I say unless we are to embark upon some such wild scheme I believe it is possible to approximate within reasonable bounds the cost of river and harbor improvement in this country within the next 25 years. Of course, if we enter upon other works having no direct or necessary relation to navigation, there is no telling where we will land. Why, there are propositions advanced, some of them now before Congress, advocated and supported by men of national repute, the adoption and the carrying out of which, it is said by competent engineers, would cost billions of dollars. But assuming we are to pursue a safe and sane policy such as we have been pursuing for the past several decades, then I believe it is easy, or at least it is not very difficult, to approximate within reasonable bounds as to what the Government will be called upon to expend in the near future, by which I mean in the next quarter of a century.

We have on the books to-day, including those taken on in this bill, about $300,000,000 of projects, $150,000,000, in round figures, or half of it, being for four rivers—the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Missouri, and the East River in New York, the last named, however, only requiring about $13,000,000 to complete. The work on these four streams, if the plans laid down by the engineers are followed, is to extend over a period ranging from 8 to 25 years; perhaps a little beyond that. The other $150,000,000 will likely be required during the next 8 years; that is, if the plans of the engineers are carried out. Of course there will be other projects; but we must remember that there are yet other projects still on hand and yet to be considered. There were before our committee about $50,000,000 of projects submitted within the past two years besides the $38,000,000 we have adopted in this bill. I do not know that all of those will meet with favorable consideration in the future; the chances are they will not; but if they should all be adopted, the amount, including those adopted or recommended in this bill, will reach $350,000,000.

WHAT THIS BILL MEANS.

On the fifth day of discussion, near the conclusion of the debate on items in the bill, a colloquy occurred from which I am quoting an extract because of its exposition of the true inwardness of this bill:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of making a statement.

A question has been asked of me as to what amount of money is appropriated in this bill. I have stated that $72,000,000 is the amount of money appropriated, except that $33,000,000 of that amount must be expended by future Congresses; but the projects are established or adopted by this Congress. In other words, $39,000,000 in cash is here appropriated and $33,000,000 in addition is authorized. That is right, is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. I will say to the gentleman he is mistaken about that. The amount authorized and appropriated in this bill is $43,289,004. Four million and sixty-one thousand five hundred dollars of that is placed in the bill by way of authorization, which would reduce the amount of cash to $39,227,504. I will show to my friend he has been led into error, no doubt. The new projects adopted, as I stated the other day, will require some $38,684,700.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will permit me, I am thoroughly familiar with that. We have gone over this matter two or three times, but will the gentleman explain to us why, if you have here adopted or provided $38,000,000, and you have only appropriated five million and some odd dollars toward those projects, you are going to have the remaining $33,000,000 employed in building these projects without future Congresses appropriating it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is true, but we have not yet made the appropriations.

Mr. FREAR. That is true? Then this is equally true, that you have hereby appropriated $39,000,000 of cash and $33,000,000 future Congresses must necessarily appropriate to carry out the projects provided here, for which you have appropriated $5,000,000 in this bill. You can not start the $5,000,000 appropriation unless you complete it.

Now just one more statement as to the total amount of money that is owed by this Government that will be required by these projects in the future. Three hundred and five million dollars is the amount of money this Government is now owing for river and harbor improvements, including the $43,000,000 that is under this appropriation bill and $33,000,000 more in new projects is proposed by that. That is a burden on this Government, is it not? That is your statement in the report?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is quite a difference between an authorization and an appropriation.

Mr. FREAR. Is there a difference between authorization and appropriation when you start a project that necessarily must be completed else all the money that is put into the project will be wasted? Five million dollars you have put into these projects, and you are providing that $33,000,000 must be appropriated in order to complete them.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the House thoroughly understands the matter.

Mr. FREAR. I think it does. But the next committee, if the gentleman pleases, may establish $33,000,000 more in new projects, because you say here $92,000,000 were presented in addition—to which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] nods his head—and you refused to make appropriations for those projects; but the next committee may recommend that appropriation or the next House may make an appropriation and establish these new projects, amounting to $92,000,000 additional.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It may, but it is not likely.

Mr. FREAR. So that it is a continual charge.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

A MISLEADING STATEMENT.

The gentleman from Wisconsin stated the amount that is carried in the bill, though he expressed it a little differently from the way we express it, when he said that there was authorized so much. That word "authorized" has a particularly definite meaning here. But when we adopt a project, of course, it does mean that the Government has assumed the obligation to complete it.

The bill carries $43,400,000, in round figures. During the past several days the gentleman from Wisconsin has moved to strike out numerous items contained in the bill. I do not say now, and have not heretofore said, and shall not hereafter say anything in criticism of him for that. I am perfectly satisfied that he did it because he believed that by so doing he was serving his country well. It is just a difference of opinion.

Now, I have taken the trouble to examine the RECORD to ascertain just how much the gentleman from Wisconsin has proposed to reduce this bill by the numerous amendments which he has offered. The items which the gentleman moved to strike from the bill, not including the Ohio River, made a total of $568,225. Here they are, showing the page of the bill, the name of the project, the amount appropriated for each, and the tonnage of each—$568,225. That is how much less this $43,000,000 bill would be to-day if the gentleman from Wisconsin had had his way. "All his conquest, glories, victories, spoils shrunk to this little measure."

Now listen: The projects for which that amount, $568,225, is appropriated floated last year 3,520,335 tons of commerce. That is three times as much American tonnage as it is estimated will pass through the Panama Canal, and that is all represented by an appropriation of $568,225. The value of that commerce was $33,932,495. Now, in view of the fact that I have only five minutes I hope I shall not be interrupted. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] during three days, after having devoted, as he tells us, a great deal of study to this bill, was able to point out appropriations aggregating $568,225, not including the Ohio River, which in his judgment ought to be stricken from the bill. The truth is he has made a very persistent and conscientious, though ineffective, effort to reduce the bill just that amount.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; ineffective. [Laughter.]

I have quoted at some length to get the committee's understanding of the bill before the House. The criticism of my ineffectual efforts to amend the bill is not offered to explain my own course, which fully appears in the RECORD, but it gives an insight into the strange mind workings of the gentleman from Mississippi. That is of much value at this time, because he is the great champion of the Mississippi reclamation project, its ablest and most persistent ally on this floor. In fact, he is second to none in ability and influence on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee. In his statement, so carefully tabulated, showing some of the bad items I had ineffectually tried to have stricken from the bill, he excludes the Ohio River appropriation of $5,000,000 which I moved to strike out, the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal item of $8,000,000, the Missouri River item of $2,000,000, and a score of lesser appropriations which I opposed. This is all shown by the RECORD. Again, the Oklawaha River is a $733,000 project, although it masquerades in the bill at $175,000. This also appears in the RECORD. Again, the large item of tonnage with which his statement is burdened is that of Curtis Bay, Md., which is a $123,700 project for an additional depth in Chesapeake Bay of 5 feet, making a total 35-foot depth, all for the benefit of private manufacturing interests, as has been shown to the committee, and misleading in its total tonnage effect.

All these facts are undisclosed by the distinguished exponent of the Mississippi River $275,000,000 reclamation project who refused to be interrupted. Criticisms and objections to items in the bill totaling many millions of dollars which were offered by me are now represented by him to aggregate only $568,225. Why? The only answer I need offer to this distortion is that if $568,225 in that bill ought to be stricken from it, the bill should be defeated. Yet, over $20,000,000 in this bill are, in my judgment, about to be wasted, as I have specifically pointed out. And no sufficient answer to satisfy the people who pay the bills has been offered by anyone on this floor.

WHO PAYS THE BILLS?

Every State contributes its share to this great pork barrel. Wisconsin's share of the $76,000,000 burden foisted on the country by the bill is, approximately, $2,250,000, or about $1 for every man, woman, and child within the State. Of the $100,000,000 already sunk in the Mississippi River alone Wisconsin's contribution has been about $3,000,000, although nothing can be shown from the expenditure beyond a series of engineering mistakes for boats that no longer float. Three hundred and five million dollars is now owing by the Government for present uncompleted river projects, with a few harbor improvements included to take off the curse. This obligation places an additional $9,000,000 burden on the people of my State, their share, or over $3 more for every man, woman, and child in the State. Money is taken from us at the point of a legislative gun, with the demand to stand and deliver. And we will deliver it with a full knowledge that 90 per cent of all these vast amounts, together with $76,000,000 included in this bill, is criminally, although legislatively wasted.

My State and every other State has a direct interest in this wasted money, one-fourth of which we are advised goes north of the Ohio River. On the average we contribute $10 annually for every dollar received by the State for waterway projects. Surrounded by the greatest river and two greatest lakes in the world, possessing the greatest inland single harbor in the country and many others of great commercial importance, we are taxed for scores of unnavigable rivulets and creeks from North Carolina to Texas. It has been suggested on the floor that through political pull the committee allowed two small grafts to Wisconsin. Every dollar paid by the Government for illegitimate projects in Wisconsin is of no benefit to the people in my State, and is as wasteful and inexcusable there as in any other State.

THE LARGE QUESTION INVOLVED.

Local considerations must give way, Mr. Chairman, to the greater question of legislative honesty, which overshadows all others. The appropriations in this bill, with a few exceptions which need no defense, are a travesty on lawmaking, an assault on legislative conscience, blunting our sensibilities on other measures which become contaminated by this same pork-barrel graft. To pass the bill in its present form is to steal millions of dollars outright from the Federal Treasury, money contributed by every State in the Union, money to be wasted for the supposed benefit of local constituencies and for the assumed benefit of local Representatives interested in its passage. Men who would denounce to the utmost any effort to take one dollar from the Federal Treasury for their personal gain, men of the highest individual honor, yet wink at this ill-smelling barrel. How long are we to carry on this river and harbor graft that annually forges ahead in amounts by leaps and bounds? How long before the public will be aroused to the enormity of this vicious legislative practice? How long can we evade the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," by smugly answering, "But if you are going to steal, let us divide it out and not go to complaining"?

$76,000,000 IS A LARGE AMOUNT.

Mr. Chairman, I fully realize that any attempts to criticize the tremendous waste of money in the manner so crudely presented by me in this hurried discussion must meet with disfavor at the hands of Members who have in the past, will now, or expect to in the future receive generous gratuities from river and harbor pork barrel appropriations. Nay, more, I appreciate that expressions of disapproval on this subject relative to wasted public money will subject me to further humorous criticisms concerning my unsophisticatedness, so liberally indulged in by members of the committee and others upon this floor who are favored by the bill.

I further expect it will be urged that these large sums of money seem large only to provincial eyes, but to Army engineers and to Members who are accustomed to deal in millions such items are of no magnitude. I accept without complaint criticisms past and future because of my verdant and inexperienced judgment.

Although a new Member, I trust it will not be presumptuous to say in explanation of these views that it became my duty during the half dozen years prior to my election to this body to audit more millions of public money than are contained in this bill, not excluding its new projects so skillfully concealed by small initial appropriations in a bill totaling $76,000,000. I offer this suggestion in no spirit of reply to criticisms, but to explain a habit unconsciously formed of looking upon public moneys as a trust placed in the hands of public officials to be expended for the public good—not private greed. Neither do I assume a virtue not possessed by every other Member, but I do say that this pork barrel blunts legislative sensibilities.

PRESENT SYSTEM OF RIVER LEGISLATION.

I have tried to make plain that legitimate harbor improvements, where any considerable amount of navigation exists, are not criticized. I do believe that in some of these cases contribution should be required from the State or municipality especially interested as a condition of receiving Federal aid. That such matters should be removed absolutely from the province of an Army engineer to determine seems needless to say. The power to determine should be lodged elsewhere, and recommendations to Congress should be made by an administrative branch of the Government in order that the riot of waste now existing might be placed to the credit or discredit of some competent responsible department. Engineering officials should be restricted to the field of furnishing technical data concerning any proposed project. Under present conditions Congress pries money out of the Treasury for rivers and harbors only on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, who can overturn all rules of lacking necessity therefor at the suggestion of some one with a political pull. By permission of this shoulder-strapped custodian of our river and harbor conscience we may steal openly and shamelessly, resting the responsibility upon an incompetent Army engineer. Without his pass through the lines into the Treasury vaults we would hesitate to knock down the guard; with his signature in our possession we are legislatively immune from arrest and punishment. I speak of the system, not of any particular officer. He may not be able to earn his salt or run a peanut stand successfully, yet Representatives in Congress stand knocking at his door, hat in hand, cringing for his favor. With all due solemnity he advises us that as a matter of commercial necessity the Government should construct some expensive project for the benefit of a fertilizing factory up Salt Creek. Commerce will be aided and freight rates reduced on two paralleling railroads by expending $733,000 more on Oklawaha River for the benefit of Mr. Young's drainage scheme. The raging Kissimmee Creek, containing water four months in the year, is a profitable $47,000 Government investment when we learn an ex-Congressman has a real estate proposition depending on the project. In fact, we never miss the river though the Kissimmee runs dry.

Will the taxpayer in New York, Chicago, or San Francisco be especially benefited in the improvements demanded by the fertilizing factories of Mattewan Creek or Scuppernong? These are weighty commercial problems which the Chief Engineer must determine, aided by local interests and the local Member's judgment. After reading the reports I have placed before the committee no business man would attempt to run a private venture for 30 days, though backed by the Bank of England, if a Chief of Engineer's judgment was to determine its practicability. It is no check upon Congress to have the Chief of Engineer's approval. Responsibility, like a caged squirrel, runs round and round from the Congressional recommendation for a survey to the engineer's report, based on the recommendation, and after it is all over the engineer takes the blame because, although acting at the behest of the local Member, as shown by these reports, he can not squeal for fear of losing his job. It is all a part of a pernicious system in which engineers are forced to do what is discreditable through the importunities of others whose duty it also is to guard Uncle Sam's strong box.

WHO WILL SMASH THE BARREL?

Will the $76,000,000 pork barrel get smashed? It is unlikely, because it contains past favors in the form of "maintenance," continuing projects that are being pressed, favors in the form of present appropriations, and future favors in the surveys recommended. The barrel is hooped by bands of steel. I make no play upon words. It encompasses every State from Maine to Texas. Otherwise it could not get through. It asks for the excavation of harbors good, bad, and indifferent; of 25 projects in North Carolina and 21 in Florida, aggregating before completion several millions of dollars, although the entire 46 projects, it is safe to say, do not in all equal the Duluth-Superior harbor traffic in my own State with its 29,171,000 tonnage.

Have I needlessly exaggerated the importance of this $76,000,000 bill? Let us see.

WHAT $76,000,000 WILL DO.

Seventy-six million dollars will build an airline Government railway from New York to San Francisco at an average expense of $25,000 a mile.

Seventy-six million dollars will place three shining quarters in the pocket of every man, woman, and child in the country, white and colored.

Seventy-six million dollars will rebuild the National Capitol, including also the National Library, White House, State Department, Treasury, and Patent Office.

Seventy-six million dollars will furnish a local weekly newspaper to the head of every family in the country and two good monthly magazines for the family.

Seventy-six million dollars will pay the salaries of all the Cabinet officers for 70 centuries and build a monument 2,000 feet high to the ubiquitous Army engineers.

Seventy-six million dollars will furnish five dreadnaughts, and the surplus would hang to the masthead of every vessel in the Navy life-sized portraits of the plucking board.

Seventy-six million dollars would pay the salary of the President for a thousand years and leave a million dollars for pens and ink with which to write veto messages to vicious river and harbor bills.

Seventy-six million dollars is a good deal of money.

PRESIDENT TAFT HESITATED.

Mr. Chairman, I have little hope that the river and harbor bill will be defeated in this House. A score of amendments I have offered have been rejected, and yet I do not consider the effort wasted. Possibly the bad features contained in the bill will receive attention at the other side of the Capitol, so that at the hands of abler and more experienced critics the unsavory bill will be sidetracked. I have been advised this is unlikely, and that the bill will be returned to us loaded down to the gunwales with additional wasteful items. If so, no comment is permitted, under the rules, otherwise honest opinion would sound unparliamentary.

I do say that if this bill reaches the White House in its present form I hope the President will not be asleep at the switch, but will sidetrack the iniquitous measure into the waste-basket. Nothing that the President could do during this session would give to the people greater confidence in his fearless, conscientious performance of duty.

President Taft threatened to veto the river and harbor bill passed in 1910, which covered three years. He said in his memorandum, Document No. 651, Sixty-first Congress:

> I have given to the consideration of this bill the full 10 days since its submission to me, and some time before that. The objections are to the system, for it may be conceded that the framers of the bill have made as good a bill as they could under the "piecemeal" policy. I once reached the conclusion that it was my duty to interpose a veto in order, if possible, to secure a change in the method of framing these bills. Subsequent consideration has altered my view as to my duty.
> It is now three years since a river and harbor bill was passed. The projects under way are in urgent need of further appropriation for maintenance and continuance, and there is great and justified pressure for many of the new projects provided for by the bill. It has been made clear to me that the failure of the bill thus late in the session would seriously embarrass the constructing engineers. I do not think, therefore, the defects of the bill which I have pointed out will justify the postponement of all this important work; but I do think that in the preparation of the proposed future yearly bills Congress should adopt the reforms above suggested, and that a failure to do so would justify withholding executive approval, even though a river and harbor bill fail.

TAFT'S MESSAGE AND THIS BILL.

Bearing on this pork barrel denunciation by President Taft of unbusinesslike methods; of inadequate appropriations scattered over a vast number of projects in order to secure the bill's passage, I quote from the committee report for 1914:

The bill appropriates in cash $39,227,504, and authorizes $4,061,500 in addition, the whole aggregating $43,289,004. The authorizations are $3,000,000 for the Ohio River; $1,000,000 for the Delaware River from Allegheny Avenue, Philadelphia, to the sea; and $61,500 for Beverly Harbor, Mass. The $3,000,000 for the Ohio River is a part of the $5,000,000 required to be furnished annually under a declaration in the rivers and harbors bill passed in 1910 of an intention to complete the improvement in 12 years, the provision having been construed by the committee to mean that the amount necessary to complete the project shall be appropriated within that period.

The aggregate of the bill may, at first glance, appear large, but when we consider the demand, indeed, the necessity, for river and harbor improvement, as shown among other things by the large number of new projects before Congress, together with the total of estimates furnished by the Chief of Engineers of the amounts necessary to carry on unfinished works under projects heretofore adopted, and to maintain those already completed, it is not unnecessarily large, but is entirely within reasonable bounds.

Then follows a little item of $38,648,700 which is offered to appease hungry constituents all over the country, as follows:

NEW PROJECTS.

In addition to the items for the old, or existing, projects we have added 76 new projects, requiring in all to complete, $38,684,700, while only $5,786,829 have been appropriated and authorized in the bill.

Continuing over to page 5 of this 10-page illuminating report, which carries $76,000,000, we find this additional comforting assurance:

The new projects were selected from a list of 93 reported by the engineers mainly within the last two years, and requiring for completion about $92,500,000. But the committee, feeling that it could not take care of all of them in the present bill, selected what it deemed the most urgent, expecting, of course, to give consideration to the remaining projects, and others which may be reported later, in the next and subsequent bills. These additions make the aggregate of the adopted projects, including those in the present bill, about $305,500,000. But this amount embraces a number of large and expensive works, such as the Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio, the Missouri, the Ohio, and East Rivers, which require for their completion about $150,000,000, the appropriations for which will necessarily extend over a long period of time ranging from 8 to upward of 20 years, leaving the balance, about $155,000,000, to be furnished within a period of 8 years, if the suggestions and recommendations of the engineers are to be followed.

To better understand the cause for this $76,000,000 bill, we read, page 7:

The committee has given every possible care to the consideration of the bill, having devoted nearly 10 weeks to its active preparation, and a much longer time in preliminary work, during which many hearings by representatives and citizens of various parts of the country were held, from which much useful information was gained. The measure is therefore submitted with the belief that it merits and will receive the indorsement of Congress.

President Taft declared that "Executive approval" should be withheld from such bills.

APPROPRIATION DOUBLED IN 10 YEARS.

No engineer could have uttered a threat more far-reaching in its possibilities. It sounds like the clarion tones that ring out from every engineer's report, asking for an immediate appropriation of the full amount. Such conclusions are based on good business principles, but the river and harbor bill is not drafted on business principles. It is intended to reach as far as possible in new projects and continuing projects in order to carry the barrel through without accident. Projects that will take a hundred years to complete are found in the bill, because of this desire to make the appropriations go into every district.

President Taft hesitated when confronted with his duty. He says in his memorandum that the bill covers three years. What will be said by President Wilson when he learns that the total appropriations from all sources toward rivers and harbors reached $49,380,541 in 1911, $40,559,620 in 1912, and $51,115,889 in 1913? Accepting the face of the present bill at $43,289,004 instead of $76,000,000, the actual amount promised to be paid, and we have a total appropriation for four years of $184,345,034. From 1895 to 1904, inclusive, during a period of 10 years, when navigation yet existed to some extent on inland waterways, the total amount appropriated was $184,424,918. In other words, in the last four years, providing the 1914 bill becomes a law, we will have appropriated the same amount, practically, as we did during the entire decade in which Senator TILLMAN lashed small pork barrels.

This bill is subject to the objections urged by President Taft and in addition is weighted down with so many objectionable items that the President will perform one of the real great acts of his administration if it receives his veto.

WHY NOT DEFEAT THE BILL HERE?

Mr. Chairman, in this hurried presentation of reasons why the river and harbor bill should be defeated because of its general character, I have not attempted to cover many objectionable items which elbow each other, for dishonorable mention, on practically every page of the bill.

Facts have been presented which should put every Member to his own independent investigation. I assume full responsibility for every citation and every deduction from statistical tables, all of which I have been compelled through lack of aid to individually collate and prepare, yet facts which I believe are correctly stated, even if subject to different deductions. The facts as presented have been offered without pride of discovery and their acceptance or adoption by others will be evidence of their argumentative value. Defeat of every amendment and passage of the bill by the House will not effect a final determination. Rather be it understood that the days given over to a discussion of its demerits have marked a preliminary skirmish. If it shall pass here, I have hopes the bill's 66 pages, containing hundreds of items, will be ventilated by abler and more effective agencies at the other end of the Capitol. I say this, notwithstanding the engineers' reports disclose some of its most pernicious items have friends there on guard.

Even if it passes both Houses, the people believe in the honesty of purpose of the President. We may differ with him as to certain governmental policies, but there ought to be no difference of opinion as to legislative honesty and the fundamental unsoundness of this bill.

Because it includes a few good items we should not be obliged to gag over an egg that is partly bad. This measure, I believe, is nine-tenths bad and wasteful.

Mr. Chairman, the bill proposes to throw away that proportion of all receipts from the Federal income tax. It proposes to encumber us with $76,000,000 expenditures now and hereafter—a sum of money which would give employment at living wages to the heads of a hundred thousand families the year round. What are we offered in return? Pork-barrel legislation that offers no permanent Government investment, but on the contrary places a mortgage upon the legislative conscience of every factor contributing to the result. I believe the President desires to serve his people and make his party an agency for good. He can do neither if this bill becomes a law. On the contrary, such legislation will be a perpetual indictment against his administration and against his party, which gained the confidence of the people through its professions of economy. I can not believe he will do less than his predecessor in office. I believe he will veto the bill if it comes before him. By so doing he will place the stamp of public disapproval upon all other efforts to enact bad laws.

Mr. BALTZ. Mr. Chairman, the work of protection against floods in the Mississippi Valley is one not only of stupendous importance but of stupendous accomplishment. It is now being performed by county municipalities alone, and evidences not only the necessity for its performance but the spirit of patriotism and willingness of the people to bear a financial burden with good will and unselfishness, though they realize that their effort will profit not only miles of territory and millions of people but the Government as well.

Along the east side of the river alone in my congressional district, fronting on that noble and historic stream, projects amounting in all to over $7,000,000 are in course of construction to make safe the navigation of the river, and the property on its banks and the adjacent property is being taxed therefor. This in addition to other taxes, such as State, county, municipal, and so forth, which places the burden on the shoulders of a few, comparatively speaking. The United States Corps of Engineers commends this work, and it is being scientifically and thoroughly done in the hope that it will alleviate conditions in that section of the country.

This Government expends millions of dollars annually in projects which I believe worthy, but not so worthy or so necessary as is this. The experience of the floods only a short time ago is still fresh in our minds, and the call for governmental aid has gone up not alone from those stricken valleys, but from the business men of the country at large, who recognize the importance of making these great arteries of travel and transportation safe for human and commercial freight at every season of the year. The effect of a disaster such as occurred in the Valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries is Nation wide, and there will be no opposition on the part of any right-thinking or well-balanced man or woman should the Government yield to the call for assistance and make a liberal appropriation for this work. It is equipped with the greatest and most efficient corps of engineers in the world, who are competent and willing to undertake a project of this character and magnitude.

Ours is a Government so wealthy and so rich in resources that it can afford to extend its beneficent aid to a population so great and so generous in its own efforts, without stint or reckoning. The call goes out from the northern border to the Gulf, from the metropolises of the East to beyond the Rocky Mountains on the West. Shall it be heeded and that great pathway of commerce be insured for all time against the wiping out of life and property and the loss of business which has hitherto and would again utilize that natural outlet to the sea, that great artery which connects the forests of the North, the wheat fields of the Middle West with the semitropic regions of the South?

Let us begin on a work which in years to come will prove to future generations that this great and strong Government of ours can yield itself to an interior project just as important in many ways as our new boast—the construction of the Panama Canal. When begun, it will certainly be concluded, and when concluded, it will prove an investment of which this country will never be ashamed.

Locally we feel that this is most important. East St. Louis, with its hundred thousand population and rapidly growing, is one of the queen cities on the banks of that river. Other cities in the same district are adding yearly to their population and all are interested vitally in the protection from floods and safety for their belongings. In that one levee and sanitary district the people are doing all they can. The district covers nearly 97 square miles, the real value of the land thus incorporated into the district being about $58,000,000. The work thus far laid out and well under way will cost $6,500,000, and that sum will be assessed upon the district at the rate of nearly $700 per square mile. Is a better example of earnestness and of fear needed? This in itself should prove to the Government that assistance is necessary and make us give heed to the conditions which surround these people. To give you an idea of what is being done, I ask permission to incorporate as a portion of my remarks the description of the plan of protection in this levee district of which I have just spoken, as set forth in the report of the Chief of Engineers. He says:

The general plan of works for the protection and drainage of the district is as follows:

Changing the course of Cahokia Creek from about the point where it emerges from the bluffs, through a diversion channel directly west to the Mississippi River, the earth from the cut to be used in constructing high levees on either side, thus forming the northern protection. On the west a system of levees, equal in height to a 45-foot stage of water in the river, connecting with the levee of the diversion channel and continuing to the southern limits of the district. On the south a levee back to the bluffs, along the north side of the diversion channel of Prairie Du Pont Creek.

In the interior a system of drainage canals beginning in the northern end of the district, running south through the present lakes and passing out through the south levee, the water in low stages of the river to pass through the levee by means of floodgates. When the river is high, gates to be closed and water forced through levee by means of pumps of large capacity.

Lateral canals will be added to main drainage canal to catch and control creeks issuing from the bluffs and to reverse the natural westward flow of drainage west of the canal, discharging it into the main canal.

All levees are to have 3:1 slopes, both sides, except along the river where they are to be protected by a concrete facing, when the outside slope will be 2:1. The tops of all levees in the district are to be 7 feet above the high-water stage of 1903, or 3 feet above that of 1844. The crown of the levee along the Cahokia diversion canal is to be 10 feet, all other levees 8 feet.

The Cahokia diversion canal is to have a bottom width of 100 feet, side slopes 2:1, berm to toe of levee 50 feet. The bottom of canal at Cahokia Creek is to be 425 feet, Memphis datum. The height of the 1844 flood at this point was 436.9 feet, Memphis datum. The bottom slope of the canal westward from the bluff is to be 1 foot per mile.

This gives an idea of the scope of the work and what is sought to be accomplished. If to this, in this district and others along this wonderful waterway, could be added the assistance and cooperation of the United States, it would not be long before all danger from floods either above or below would be averted; commerce would again seek this natural channel to tidewater; the people thronging its banks could rest content in the thought that threatening disaster was passed forever and those fertile valleys would teem with population and prosperity.

Can we not hope for this relief from this Nation? Can we not pause long enough in our haste to spend money on battleships and small harbors, where the sight of more than a dozen small craft a year is a miracle, and make safe and more prosperous a country which, in poulation, in area, and resources, is greater than many a kingdom? I for one do not believe our Government can afford, from either a humane or practical reason, to ignore this necessitous and righteous appeal for its aid.

[Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. BARKLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to and including the mouth of the Missouri River: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $1,000,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the amount of expenditure on the Missouri River up to the present time, and the expenditure there last year, and the appropriations in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas make a motion?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, up to the present time the sum of $4,400,000 has been expended on that section of the Missouri River from Kansas City to the mouth. This bill carries $2,000,000 more. That will make $6,400,000; and according to the statement of the gentleman from Kansas City [Mr. BORLAND] that river carried 10,000 tons of freight last year.

There was expended on the Missouri River last year, if that statement be true, $200 for every ton of freight carried; or, if you estimate the outlay as permanent improvement, the interest on the money that was expended on that river last year would amount, at 5 per cent, to $10 for every ton of freight carried on the Missouri River. If you calculate the interest on the outlay up to the present time at 5 per cent, it amounts to $32 for every ton of freight carried on the Missouri River last year.

I want to call the attention of the committee to these facts, to show what an enormous charge we are paying on every ton of freight that is carried on this river; and it is not lonesome. There are many other rivers for which appropriations are made in this bill that are as expensive to the people of this country in proportion to the amount of freight carried as this one is.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Missouri River: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel between Kansas City and the mouth of the river, $2,000,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] about the commerce on the Missouri River illustrates the mistaken point of view of those who criticize river improvement.

He indulges in some very remarkable arithmetic. First he takes the total amount of appropriations for the past five years, then he divides that by the tonnage of freight carried, and computes the cost per ton of freight. He might adopt the same remarkable method with some business man building a store if he were trying to carry on business in the uncompleted structure during its construction. He might say: "This man is building a hundred-thousand-dollar building. He has spent so far on it $50,000; and in that time the goods he has sold in that store have cost him $10 a pound."

The fact is that commerce has been resumed on the Missouri River in a substantial and satisfactory way. The whole project is to be completed from Kansas City to the mouth in 10 years, and therefore the annual expenditures are large. This is the businesslike and economical way to proceed. The river is proving itself a great carrier of freight and an aid to the commerce of all the Western States. This appropriation is fully justified and has met the approval of the Secretary of War and of this committee.

[Mr. WILLIS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Oakland, Cal.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $98,000: Provided, That if in the judgment of the Secretary of War the prices received in response to advertisement for bids for dredging are not reasonable, so much of the amount herein appropriated as shall be necessary may be expended for the purchase or construction of a suitable dredging plant.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the control of the Mississippi River and its tributaries is the most immediate and pressing national problem confronting this Congress. Most of these items are mere makeshifts. The need of the country is for permanent and complete control of the waters of the river and all its tributaries.

The Congress should enact legislation similar to that authorizing the building of the Panama Canal or the building of the Alaskan railroads, directing the President of the United States to proceed to control the Mississippi and its tributaries from its source to its mouth, and to open the tributaries to navigation wherever possible. He should be given authority and ample money should be placed at his command to enable him to proceed at once to meet this great national necessity.

Such legislation would enable any President to make his name immortal, and land values in the great valley would immediately increase so much with confidence established that the increased assessments would produce sufficient additional taxes to cover the cost of the project.

The Panama Canal makes the Mississippi control of flood waters and navigation a national necessity of superior importance.

The President should be empowered to handle this problem exactly as he has handled the Panama Canal and expects to handle the Alaskan railroad. Such legislation, assuring the country that the waters of the Mississippi and all its tributaries will be successfully and completely controlled, would be worth more to the present generation and to the generations to come in this country than a dozen Panama Canals and more than a thousand Alaskan railroads.

I call this subject to the attention of the House now because at the proper time I expect to introduce and press such legislation for your consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hudson River, N. Y., from Hudson to the dam at Troy, with a view to securing a depth of 27 feet, with suitable width.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a committee amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

Insert between lines 22 and 23, page 54, the following:
"Hudson River at Troy, N. Y., with a view to the removal of Adams Island."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Was that amendment to be inserted between lines 23 and 24?

The CHAIRMAN. Between lines 22 and 23.

The Clerk read as follows:

Delaware River, from mouth of Cooper River to Fishers Point Dike on the New Jersey shore, including consideration of any proposition for cooperation on the part of local interests.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is good policy to punish a people for being prosperous. In certain cases the Rivers and Harbors Committee has followed this policy as it affects the improvement of streams which run through municipalities. I say "certain cases," because the policy has not been strictly adhered to, since appropriations have been made for many river and harbor improvements within municipal lines. The policy has been followed, however, in the case of the Schuylkill River, which courses through the great anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania and empties into the Delaware at Philadelphia. The trouble with the Schuylkill at Philadelphia is that it has materially aided in the prosperity of the city of Philadelphia, although it has contributed through Philadelphia to an international commerce. It can not be said that Philadelphia has not contributed to the improvement of the stream. It has done this by special appropriation, although in many other sections of the country where there is no such commerce as is developed upon the Schuylkill the Federal Government makes the necessary appropriations.

In the hope of convincing the Rivers and Harbors Committee and the Congress that the Schuylkill River should not longer be barred from Federal consideration, I append certain correspondence which shows that there is a thriving business upon the Schuylkill which is in danger of diminishing unless the river depth is suitably maintained. The situation as revealed by this correspondence will show, I think, that navigation is an aid to commerce, and that those who are engaged in the commendable work of promoting commerce may be seriously handicapped if their navigation facilities are insufficient. This is not the first time I have brought this matter to the attention of the Committee, but each time it has been met with the same old suggestion that there was a "policy" which induced the Federal Government to ask municipal bodies to take care of the navigable streams coursing through their boundaries. I believe this policy is gradually breaking up under the pressure that is being made upon the committee from other sections of the country, and so long as it is, I trust it will soon be exploded in the case of the Schuylkill. If the Federal Government is to continue to make appropriations in aid of navigation where the commerce is negligible, it certainly should not deny support to projects like the Schuylkill, which creates revenue for the Government and business for the people.

The correspondence to which I refer is as follows:

THE ATLANTIC REFINING CO.,
Philadelphia, April 29, 1913.

Mr. GEORGE E. BARTOL,
Chairman Joint Executive Committee on the Improvement of the Harbor of Philadelphia and the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers.

DEAR SIR: We beg to call your attention to a bill recently introduced into Congress by the Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, providing for dredging the Schuylkill River by the United States engineers. Similar bills have failed of passage on the plea that the navigable portion of said river is entirely within the bounds of the city of Philadelphia, and therefore the expense of such dredging should be borne by the municipality. It has been demonstrated that this argument is unfair, because Congress has provided for dredging other streams located in a similar relation to other ports, and in view of the cosmopolitan nature of the business done on the Schuylkill River we consider it particularly fitting that the National Government should do the work called for in Congressman MOORE's bill.

The Schuylkill River is the terminus of two of the great trunk pipe lines bringing crude oil from the midcontinent, and should, therefore, be provided with adequate facilities for distributing petroleum products to all parts of the world. To show the wide scope of this business we need only refer to the vessels leaving our docks within, say, the last two weeks, together with those now in port loading or getting ready and due to arrive, as follows, viz:

Loaded: April 16, steamship Tonawanda, 28,000 bulk barrels gas oil for Birkenhead and Manchester, England; April 18, steamship Asama, 155,400 cases refined and lubricating oils, 610 barrels lubricating oil, grease, and wax, for Yokkaichi, Japan; April 21, barge No. 123, 12,000 bulk barrels gasoline for Wilsons Point, Conn.; April 22, steamship La Campine, 21,500 bulk barrels naphtha for Antwerp, Belgium; April 22, steamship Seneca, 183,834 cases refined and lubricating oils and naphtha, 250 barrels lubricating oil, for Fusan and Chemulpo, Korea; April 24, steamship Paul Paix, 32,000 bulk barrels refined oil for Calais, France; April 26, steamship Mariner, 99,000 cases refined oil for Patras and Piraeus, Greece.

Now loading: Steamship Largo Law, 28,000 barrels refined and lubricating oils for Dublin, Ireland; steamship Taurus, 160,000 cases refined oil and naphtha for Manila and Iloilo, P. I.; steamship Hurst, 180,000 cases refined oil for Dalny and Newchwang, China.

In port: Steamship Lovat, 225,000 cases refined oil and naphtha for Shimonoseki, Itosaki, and Hiogo, Japan; bark Braemar, 20,000 cases refined oil and naphtha for Concepcion, Argentine Republic; steamship Baku Standard, 31,000 bulk barrels refined oil for Avonmouth, England.

Now due: Steamship Paula, 25,000 bulk barrels refined oil for Copenhagen, Denmark.

If to the above we add 25,000 cases refined oil, 12,713 barrels lubricating oil, 2,486 barrels paraffin wax, 3,660 bags paraffin wax, and 530 cases paraffin wax, which during these two weeks we have delivered by lighters to line steamers loading at Delaware River docks for the ports of London, Liverpool, Manchester, Hamburg, Antwerp, and Rotterdam the total value represented will be approximately $1,800,000.

In this connection we might add the tank steamship Geestemunde is due to arrive this week with an inward cargo of 27,000 bulk barrels of crude oil from Tuxpam, Mexico.

Under existing conditions some of the deep-draft tank steamers can not come to this port for cargo, and as an illustration of the difficulties under which we labor would refer to the bulk barge Navahoe, the capacity of which is 69,000 barrels. This barge is due at our works next month, but the tank steamship Iroquois, which tows her across the Atlantic Ocean, can not load at Philadelphia. The steamer drops the barge at Delaware Breakwater, proceeds to New York for cargo, and returns to Delaware Breakwater to pick up the barge, which in the meantime has been towed by tug to Philadelphia and loaded and retowed to the breakwater. On one occasion we partly loaded the steamer here, but for want of sufficient water she had to complete loading at New York. This puts a burden on the commerce not only of this port, but of the country at large.

The depth of water in the shoal portions of the Schuylkill Channel is from 6 to 7 feet less than at some of our docks, which prevents most of the steamers from leaving except just before high water, causing not only delay to the loaded vessels but detention to those waiting to take the same loading berths.

We respectfully suggest that your committee take such action as will assist in securing the deeper channel needed, if this business is to be retained for the port of Philadelphia.

Yours, very truly,

J. W. VAN DYKE, President.

GIRARD POINT STORAGE CO.,
Philadelphia, May 5, 1913.

Joint Executive Committee on the Improvement of the Harbor of Philadelphia and the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers.

DEAR SIRS: We would like to draw the attention of your committee to bill No. 2137, introduced in the House of Representatives at Washington, on April 10, 1913, by Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, providing for the survey of the Schuylkill River.

Until recently we were under the impression that navigable streams lying wholly within a municipality must look to the municipality for the dredging necessary to keep the stream in good navigable condition. We now understand, however, that this is not strictly correct, but that the United States engineers have in the cases of several navigable streams, in a situation similar to the Schuylkill River, recommended that the National Government undertake the work of improving the channel of such streams. This being the case, we would urge that your committee lend its support to Mr. MOORE's bill.

As affording an illustration of the genuine necessity for the immediate widening and deepening of the channel of the Schuylkill River, we would mention the fact that during the rush of last season's business at Girard Point several of the ocean-going steamers that berthed at our elevator to load grain were unable to complete their loading at that point, since, if loaded to their full depth, they could not turn in the river because of the inadequacy of the channel, this latter, chiefly the result of the extensive shoaling of the river along the south bank opposite our Girard Point piers. Such vessels were the steamships Wimborne, Veturia, Glace Bay, and Crown of Toledo, all carrying heavy cargoes of grain, which vessels were compelled to finish loading their cargoes on the Delaware front, a considerable portion of their lading having to be lightered to the vessel and transferred on board by floating elevators, entailing a large additional expense, which would have been entirely avoided had the Schuylkill River been in proper navigable condition.

Furthermore, the navigation of this river would be greatly facilitated if the point of the mud flat extending into the river just above its mouth were cut away, thus widening and straightening the channel at that point.

The trans-Atlantic steamers berthing at Girard Point docks to discharge and load cargoes have been steadily increasing in size in recent years, and the commerce of the river will be greatly hampered if something be not soon done for the permanent improvement of the channel.

Yours, truly,

W. R. YOUNG, Manager.

[Joint Executive Committee on the Improvement of the Harbor of Philadelphia and the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers. Organized Oct. 17, 1888.]

PHILADELPHIA, May 7, 1913.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Schuylkill River improvement: At a recent meeting of the Joint Executive Committee on the Improvement of the Harbor of Philadelphia and the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers a letter was presented from the Atlantic Refining Co. directing the committee's attention to bill H. R. 2137, introduced by you on April 10, providing for a survey of the Schuylkill River looking to its dredging by the National Government to a depth of 35 feet from its mouth to Gibsons Point.

The joint executive committee unanimously indorsed the provisions of the bill, and referred the subject to its subcommittee on Schuylkill River to cooperate with you along lines looking to recognition by Congress of this needed improvement.

The letter from the Atlantic Refining Co. is attached hereto, and from it you will obtain valuable data emphasizing the importance of the Schuylkill River as a shipping center.

A letter is also attached from the Girard Point Storage Co., which further explains the need for deepening and widening the channel of that river.

It is the intention of the Gulf Refining Co. also to address us a letter, but this has been delayed, owing to the illness of the manager of the company, and will follow later.

The piers of the Gulf Refining Co. are located at Gibsons Point, and the company is engaged in transporting oil in bulk from Texas and operates a fleet of vessels, two of which arrived on Monday of this week and a third to-day. One of the company steamers, the Oklahoma, with a capacity of 51,000 barrels, is unable when loaded to reach the company's piers, owing to insufficient water in the Schuylkill, and is compelled to anchor at the mouth of the river and discharge part of her cargo into a lighter before proceeding to her discharging berth, which, to say the least, is most discouraging.

Will you kindly keep us advised as to the progress of your bill?

The contention of the Congress that streams within the limits of a municipality should be improved by the municipality lacks force by reason of the fact that appropriations were made in the last Congress for the improvement of certain streams within the limits of a municipality, notably the Harlem River and Newtown Creek in New York Harbor.

With every assurance of cooperation, we beg to remain,

Yours, faithfully,

JNO. W. LIBERTON,
J. S. W. HOLTON,
C. R. REARWOOD,
N. B. KELLY,
Subcommittee on Schuylkill River.

GEORGE E. BARTOL,

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF NAVIGATION,

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, M. C.,
Crozer Building, Philadelphia.

DEAR MR. MOORE: Mr. Charles C. Hahl, of the Barrett Manufacturing Co., called to see me to-day in reference to House bill 2137, introduced by you, which has for its object a survey of the Schuylkill River from its mouth to Gibsons Point, with a view to establishing a 35-foot channel between the points mentioned.

Mr. Hahl has called my attention to the fact that they are now engaged in the exportation of pitch and oil and are very much handicapped by reason of the fact that their works, located, as above stated, at Grays Point, can not be approached by a vessel drawing in excess of 21 feet 6 inches. He thinks that the Government should so dredge the channel above Gibsons Point to a depth of 21 feet at low tide, and I promised to bring this matter to your attention.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. F. SPROULE.

DEAR MR. MOORE: Schuylkill River improvement.—Referring to the letter addressed to you on the 7th instant by the subcommittee of the joint executive committee on Schuylkill River I now beg to hand you in behalf of said committee a letter addressed to the maritime exchange by the Gulf Refining Co., which I shall be glad if you will attach to the other papers in the case.

Yours, very truly,

Mr. E. R. SHARWOOD,
Secretary Philadelphia Maritime Exchange,
Bourse Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: We understand that the Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE has introduced a bill in Congress by which the Secretary of War will be authorized to have certain improvements made in the Schuylkill River.

As we are vitally interested in any project that will improve the conditions of this river, we wish to give it all the indorsement possible, with a view to having the waterway improved so that our vessels may proceed to our dock at Gibsons Point without incurring expense and delays to which they are at present subjected.

On account of the limited draft of water our smaller vessels are unable to take a cargo to the dock except under certain conditions of tide, and our larger steamers are always compelled to anchor at the mouth of the river and lighter a portion of their cargo before it is possible to proceed.

In order that we may not be subjected to this additional cost, inconvenience, and difficulty in conducting our business we sincerely hope that some measure of relief can be obtained, and earnestly request that a depth of from 30 to 35 feet be attained and channel straightened as found to be required.

Yours, very truly,

JAS. KENNEDY.

COAST TRANSIT CO.,
Edgewater, N. J., June 5, 1913.

Congressman J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: During the years 1910, 1911, 1912 we transported via the Schuylkill River to and from the Barrett Manufacturing Co.'s plant 195,000 tons of material. You will remember that you wanted this information. At the present time I can not tell you what the increase will be, but it will be very much more in the future than in the years stated. For your information, we had an intimation from Baltimore that they could give us plenty of dock room and draft for our export business, but we do not want to keep any of our business away from Philadelphia.

Frankford Creek: During the last year we carried to our Frankford plant in cars approximately 3,000,000 gallons of liquid cargo. We have floating property in Philadelphia, and if facilities were such that we could get our boat up to the Frankford works we could handle it more economically and with much better dispatch.

Yours, truly,

CHAS. C. HALL.

P. S.—During the month of February we loaded a tank steamer with part cargo at the Grays Ferry plant, and had she taken on cargo at another dock in Philadelphia and sent to our dock to be completed we would not have been able to take her out on account of the depth of water, and we are now working to get some steamers to load pitch this winter, and we must be very careful to secure boats, which is a very difficult thing to do, not exceeding 21 feet 6 inches loaded.

[Joint executive committee on the improvement of the harbor of Philadelphia and the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers. Organized Oct. 17, 1888.]

PHILADELPHIA, December 18, 1913.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Schuylkill River improvement: Referring to our letter of May 7 last and to the bill introduced by you in Congress on June 3, 1913, providing for a survey of the Schulykill River from the Delaware River to South Street Bridge, with a view to dredging said river to a depth of 35 feet, we now beg to append for your information a synopsis of conditions that existed in the Schuylkill River on the 7th and 8th of the present month:

Tank S. S. Vitruvia, for Dublin and Belfast, loaded 42,000 barrels refined oil. Draft when loaded, 22 feet 10½ inches forward, 24 feet 3 inches aft. Finished 6.30 p. m., Sunday, December 7. Expected to leave dock Monday morning. Unable to get out of Schuylkill River either Monday or Tuesday on account of low tides.

Tank S. S. Willkommen, for Christiania, loaded 27,700 barrels refined oil. Draft when loaded, 23 feet 9 inches forward, 23 feet 6 inches aft. Finished 6.40 p. m., Monday, December 8. Expected to leave dock Tuesday morning. Unable to do so on account of low tide.

The drafts of these vessels were before coaling, and the Vitruvia was detained another day to coal after reaching anchorage in the Delaware River.

The loss by detention to each of these vessels is calculated at $250 to $350 per day.

High northwest winds made conditions worse than usual, but these instances, in our judgment, are strong arguments for a greater natural depth of water to meet the needs of international commerce on this river.

JNO. W. LIBERTON, Chairman,
E. R. SHEARWOOD, Secretary,
Subcommittee on Schuylkill River.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Susquehanna River above the Maryland line to Harrisburg, Pa."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will not accept this amendment, of course, I do not expect to have it passed at this time. I want to introduce the subject, however, for it presents a very large problem in the development of waterways and waterpower.

For some reason or other, back in 1904 the Susquehanna River, which is, perhaps, the longest of any along the Atlantic seaboard, was shut off, for the purposes of navigation, above the Maryland line; that is to say, all that portion of it which traverses the State of Pennsylvania and the State of New York was declared nonnavigable by executive order. That is a very unusual proceeding; and the people of the Susquehanna Valley are beginning to wonder why it is that they are denied the rights of navigation and supervision by the Government of the United States on their river and its tributaries.

Mr. GOULDEN. When was this executive order?

Mr. MOORE. It was made by the Secretary of War in 1904. The Secretary of War was Mr. Taft, and the President was Mr. Roosevelt. There were, I suppose, some good reasons for issuing the order; but there has been no question about the practical navigability of the stream.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman thinks it was a mistake?

Mr. MOORE. I think so; and I think it ought to be undone by Congress. I think the Committee on Rivers and Harbors ought to take cognizance of it, and that is the reason I bring it up at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the Clerk refer to the amendment on lines 20 and 21, on page 58. I want to be correct about the verbiage.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to recur to the item referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the item referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, between lines 20 and 21, page 58, by inserting the following:
"Muddy Creek, Butler County, Ky."

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, that ought to be "Mud Creek." I ask unanimous consent that that correction may be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That in all cases where preliminary examinations and surveys are herein or may be hereafter authorized, a preliminary examination of the river, harbor, or other proposed improvement mentioned shall first be made and a report as to the advisability of its improvement shall be submitted unless a survey or estimate is expressly directed. If upon such preliminary examination the proposed improvement is not deemed advisable, no further action shall be taken thereon without the further direction of Congress; but in case the report shall be favorable to such proposed improvement, or that a survey and estimate should be made to determine the advisability of improvement, the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to cause surveys to be made, and the cost and advisability to be reported to Congress. And such reports containing plans and estimates shall also contain a statement as to the rate at which the work should be prosecuted: Provided, That every report submitted to Congress, in addition to full information regarding the present and prospective commercial importance of the project covered by the report and the benefit to commerce likely to result from any proposed plan of improvement, shall also contain such data as it may be practicable to secure in regard to the following subjects.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Section 3 has five paragraphs. It is legislation. My inquiry is whether it is to be considered by paragraphs or by the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be inclined to think that it would be in order to offer an amendment at the end of the first paragraph. The Chair is willing to be corrected if he is wrong. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) Such other subjects as may be properly connected with such project: Provided, That in the investigation and study of these questions consideration shall be given only to their bearing upon the improvement of navigation, to the possibility and desirability of their being coordinated in a logical and proper manner with improvements for navigation to lessen the cost of such improvements and to compensate the Government for expenditures made in the interest of navigation, and to their relation to the development and regulation of commerce: Provided further, That the investigation and study of these questions may, upon review by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors when called for as provided by law, be extended to any work of improvement under way and to any locality the examination and survey of which has heretofore been or may hereafter be authorized by Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I would like to make an inquiry in reference to these surveys. Paragraph B provides for an investigation of the development and utilization of water power for industrial and commercial purposes. Paragraph C says:

Such other subjects as may be properly connected with such project: Provided, That in the investigation and study of these questions consideration shall be given only to their bearing upon the improvement of navigation, etc.

If the engineers in studying these subjects are to study the development and utilization of water power for industrial and commercial purposes, are they to be restricted in their study to the consideration so far as it has a bearing on the improvement of navigation only, or may they study the subject of the industrial and commercial purposes of the water power which may be developed?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am rather inclined to believe that the engineers would be confined in their investigation to the development and utilization of water power and its connection, whatever it may have, with navigation—with the improvement of the river or stream for the purpose of navigation. I would say further that this is a provision that was carried in the bill of 1912, I think.

Mr. MANN. I believe that is true.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And again in the bill of 1913; and those investigations, I think, have already been made.

Mr. MANN. These investigations have not been made as to the surveys provided for in this bill. There is an apparent contradiction—"the development and utilization of water power for industrial and commercial purposes."

That would apparently be a study of industrial and commercial possibilities of waterways. Then apparently in the next paragraph it is restricted to their bearing on the improvement of navigation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is another construction that might be placed upon the language, namely, that in the study of these questions consideration should be given to the subjects referred to in the words which appear before the first proviso in subdivision "e" and not to those in paragraph "b."

Mr. MANN. That is true that the proviso may only relate to the paragraph. I did not know what construction may have been placed upon this language by the War Department. It seems to me if they are to provide some place for a lock or dam that creates water power where there was industrial and commercial possibilities that they ought to be permitted to study the whole subject and not to be restricted merely to its effect upon navigation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Of course one or the other of those conclusions would be inevitable, either that the language qualifies paragraph "b" or else it is confined to paragraph "c." I do not know upon reflection, but I am inclined to believe the proper construction would confine the limitation to paragraph "c."

Mr. MANN. Well, with that explanation I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all that part of the paragraph beginning with the word "Provided," in line 13, and ending with the word "commerce," in line 21. I will not take the time to debate it, but there is no reason, it seems to me, to make any such restriction as that after the general power is given in paragraph "b."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 62, after the word "project," in line 13, strike out beginning with the word "Provided" down to and including the word "commerce," in line 21.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, just a moment—I will not take the five minutes. Paragraph "b" provides that this investigation is to be first to the development and utilization of water power for industrial and commercial purposes. Then in paragraph "c" it is provided:

That in the investigation and study of these questions consideration shall be given only to their bearing upon the improvement of navigation.

Now, why should we put an affirmative provision in the statute in this section as to a study of the utilization for industrial and commercial purposes in the improvement of one of these waterways, the creation of water power, and then say that in the investigation and study of these consideration shall be given only to their bearing upon navigation. I would like to see those words stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the chairman for a moment. Can we reach some agreement about the committee rising? I think we have done enough work to-day.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say so far as I am concerned I am willing that the committee shall rise now if an agreement can be reached for a meeting of the House and the resumption of the consideration of this bill at, say, 10 o'clock on Thursday morning.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I think 10 o'clock is too early.

Mr. MANN. Make it 11 o'clock.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Washington we can probably read on this bill until we reach some question of controversy and we will save probably two or three hours on Thursday.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, there will be a question of controversy in a minute.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be so.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I submit that I have consented to the reading of about 15 pages more than——

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want to unduly press the matter. We are going along with considerable rapidity and 15 or 20 minutes will make no difference in the comfort of any gentleman to-night and we will expedite the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; we had an understanding, I will say to the gentleman, that we would agree to section 3 and then rise.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply made my suggestion in the hope that the gentleman would see fit to agree to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not want to insist——

Mr. HARDWICK. Why can not we finish the consideration of the bill in the committee to-night?

Mr. BURGESS. Let us go ahead, and we can get through with the reading of the bill now in a few minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] that we practically had an agreement about it, and I have consented to the reading now for nearly half an hour. If I had insisted on it, according to my understanding, we might have ended it before.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Would the gentleman be willing to make it 10.30 o'clock Thursday morning?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Make it 11 o'clock. Speaking for the committee on this side, I will consent to meet at 11 o'clock Thursday morning, and I think that is as soon as the Members will be here.

Mr. HENRY. What are you going to do with to-morrow morning?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What are you going to do with Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. HENRY. You can get through with it at 12 o'clock.

Mr. COOPER. I object.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think we can get through with this bill in an hour, or an hour and a half, anyway, on Thursday morning, and so far as I am concerned will consent to 11 o'clock Thursday next.

Mr. MANN. That is satisfactory over here.

Mr. SHERLEY. How about to-morrow, for an hour?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a motion?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13811, the river and harbor bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LINTHICUM, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for one day, on account of important business.

HOUR OF MEETING THURSDAY.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock Thursday forenoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. Thursday. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will add to that for the purpose of continuing the consideration of this bill, if that is necessary.

Mr. MANN. That is not necessary.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not think it is myself.

Mr. MANN. That is for the House to determine.

The SPEAKER. That is surplusage. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN]?

There was no objection.

USELESS PAPERS IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, from the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, to which was referred the report of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury (H. Doc. No. 733), submitted a report (No. 449) thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4628. An act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

S. 4980. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1914; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, March 25, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Librarian of Congress submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $30,000 to carry out the provisions of section 2 of public act No. 14, relating to the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of a branch office at San Francisco, Cal. (H. Doc. No. 856); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report in re construction of two experimental towboats of modern but different types, with a complement of suitable barges and necessary loading and unloading facilities for towing and delivering supplies along the Mississippi River and its tributaries (H. Doc. No. 857); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10835) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to consolidate sundry funds from which unpaid Indian annuities or shares in the tribal trust funds are or hereafter may be due, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 450), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The AMERICAN AMBASSADOR: I am sure that my distinguished colleagues would heartily second me when I speak for them in answer to the toast that you have so kindly proposed—The Foreign Ambassadors—when I say that they especially regard you and the great interests that you stand for in this Kingdom with great respect. I can not speak more definitely for them, because you must remember that I am, with the exception of His Excellency from Japan, the youngest in service of them all.

Now, going on to speak more particularly for myself and my own country, permit me to say that it gives me a peculiar pleasure to accept your very kind invitation, because we in the United States, as you know, think in rather concrete terms, and men of affairs are our typical men. When I face a body like you I have the sensation of feeling quite at home in a certain sense. Indeed, I think I state it truly when I say that we regard the British Empire, first, as the guardian of freedom in all its far-off parts; then, secondly, as the promoter of trade throughout the whole world. I heartily enter into your applause also of what several gentlemen said, notably the prime minister, when he spoke of your concern for the men that work with you and work under you and for your ready applause for plans to train those whose misfortunes make them a burden upon the State. That strikes a sympathetic note also in our great commercial interests and aims in the United States.

I will not say that we constructed the Panama Canal even for you. For I am speaking with great frankness and not with diplomatic indirection. We built it for reasons of our own. But I will say that it adds to the pleasure of building that great work that you will profit by it. You will profit most by it for you have the greatest carrying trade. I can say a similar thing about the recent lowering of our tariff. We did not lower it in order to please you. It was for purposes that we considered economically sound for ourselves. Nevertheless, it added to the pleasure of doing that to reflect that thereby we should have more trade with you. Concerning the recent message of the President, I take it upon myself, on my own responsibility, to say this: He delivered that message not to please you but to express the true sentiment and self-respect of the American Nation. As I interpret it, his was the voice of the people. Nevertheless, it adds to the pleasure of hearing that voice to know that it does please you.

Our trade across the Atlantic for many years consisted chiefly of our sending you food. Now, we have so many bellies of our own to feed that we are eating it ourselves. We will willingly spare you any surplus, but I observe with pleasure that we are sending to you more and more also the products of our manufactures and buying from you more and more also, both which are most fortunate transactions for us both. Your pound sterling is quite good enough money for us, and I think you regard the Yankee dollar somewhat in the same way.

The only agricultural export which we now make to your kingdom in great quantities is cotton. That we shall continue to send you so long as you want it and will pay a good price for it, and I hope we will send it in the future in better grading and in better shape, for our cotton farmers are at last learning that there is not only neatness but also a certain profit in doing the task right. As for your trade with us it grows constantly, and will grow each way across the Atlantic. For this reason these things that you have learned so well to make you will continue to make. We increase in numbers and wealth and needs, and of course we buy from you these things that you have learned to make so well. I think you will buy more and more, because after we have learned to make a thing well enough to sell to you we are likely to improve still upon that in order to retain your custom. As for cotton, which is quite an important matter of trade between you and us, may I ask information which I have tried to get all my life? You have spent men and money in trying to grow cotton in Africa—I do not mean Egypt. Our cotton growers laugh at you, perhaps in their ignorance, and say you will never do it successfully. You tell me you are about to do it and we had better look out for the cotton trade. Now, our cotton students in the United States I have been reared to look upon as truthful men. I have had no experience in this Kingdom with gentlemen who have tried to deceive me. So where am I? It occurs to me only to remark in passing, with regard to that, that we took the Negro to the cotton, let me say nearly a century ago, and, following our mistake, you seem bent upon imitating it by trying to take the cotton to the Negro. It took us a century to teach him to cultivate it well. May it not take you a century to teach him to cultivate it well also? Meantime you can spend much money and much men and acquire many new diseases in your effort. I beg to make a suggestion that if you burn and itch to engage in cotton culture for yourselves I could point you to a land where it is not an experiment, where land is very cheap, where people know how to grow it, and where the long, genial sunshine clothes the field in the fleecy staple every autumn; and if you went there or sent men there you would find that all the white folk are of your own kith and kin, for foreigners to our race have never gone there, and the only difference that I can see is that cotton that is actually grown grows under the Stars and Stripes, and your cotton that is to be grown in the future is under your flag.

There are certain differences between you, your great commercial interests, your habits and ours, which of course have interested me and which you with your large experience in the United States know even better than I do. One such as I should say was this, that the most striking thing about the great commercial interests of this Empire is this fact, that for three centuries you have exploited the earth, and have engaged in successful adventures in all lands and all seas, and you have built up the most wonderful machinery for holding and expanded [sic] trade that the world has ever seen, and in doing that you have developed a marvelous faculty for conserving all that you gain. On the other hand, the American has to be swift of foot and quick of mind to get an opportunity, and when he gets the opportunity he is not slow to improve it. Therefore he has developed what you are kind enough to call adaptability. Well, I think he has, and he has developed another thing, which he has in common with you. To what extent you have it also I can not say. He has been wise enough we think—foolish enough, as some others think—to take joy in his business. You sometimes wonder why Americans do not retire. Retire to what? The thing they care for is their business. That is their sport, their recreation, their cricket, their grouse, their hunting, their shooting, their exaltation, their elevation to the House of Peers. It is the whole thing. He is not simply a maker of wares to sell, or the seller of wares. A man builds around his shop a social structure, and is more interested in men than he is in things. He will build around his factory a similar idea, and he carries with him all the time the notion that he is serving his fellows. Therefore with this devotion of spirit something comes to pass. Now, if we have inherited that from you, I gratefully acknowledge the obligation, but I should like to remind you that this is a tremendous force in the commerce of the world, and I think you will have to reckon with your kinsman across the sea as he develops that temperament still further.

May I put in another parenthesis, also on my own account, and correct an impression that a part of your press seems to have about the attitude of the United States Government concerning the investment of your colossal earnings in States of Central America that have volcanic tendencies? I sometimes read that the United States is entering upon a policy to discourage foreign investments there. That is untrue. I think that some events are happening there that have discouraged them somewhat, but I hope that they can not be charged to the United States. There is a policy forming in the minds of our Government and our people, which is not new, that would discourage such investments or such concessions as would carry with them the control of the government of any of those States, and only such, for so far as the United States is concerned you know how heartily we have welcomed your investments in our land and still welcome them and always will. You may be assured that it is none of the business of the United States to put any let or hindrance upon any legitimate investments of yours anywhere in the world, and they most heartily welcome your investments in any part of the Americas, provided only you do not make them so that you may possibly take the country with them. The Monroe doctrine meant this, when it was first formulated, that the United States would object to any European Government's taking more land in the New World. In those days the only way that a foreign Government could gain land was literally to go and take it. Now we have more refined methods of exploitation, and there are other ways to take it. That is the only protest that the United States has ever whispered. You will, I am sure, understand why the United States prefers that no land in the New World should be acquired in these new subtle ways. Would you do us the kindness clearly to understand that, and possibly to correct the misimpression that has gone abroad?

In addition to all this trade there are certain branches and incidents of our intercourse which are interesting. For instance, once in a while we buy a picture from you at twice the price you can buy it yourselves. You criticise us and take our money. Much more often you bring home our attractive ladies, and you smile, but you also bring their fortunes with them. Once in a long while we acquire an antique—when the dealer by mistake really sends home to us the piece that we bought. You complain of our rapacity, but you take our money. In all these transactions you will allow me to observe without offense that the ladies and the money all come to you. Now, in the wanderings of my countrymen about your island they always leave a shilling "for the repair of the old castle," and even the vergers in your cathedrals receive our coined thanks. Our travelers go on your railroads and stop at your hotels. When they go into your shops your shopkeepers show an eager ear for the American intonation. In fact, we should have thought that it was a delicate compliment to the American travelers on your railroads that you recently engaged an American manager, so that we should be made to feel at home, if you had not made so much fuss about it yourselves. In all those things you show yourselves shrewd traders. For what do we get? We get a little English history in broken doses for all our expenditure.

Next to free government, which had its birth and its beginnings in this kingdom, the greatest fact, I take it, in the whole world is the colossal structure of British commerce that binds all parts of the earth together and makes men know one another, and therefore become more reasonable and, I hope, more peaceful. I should like to set beside that fact the enormous, almost incalculable, domestic trade between the 48 great American Commonwealths, which goes on forever increasing, without any tariffs or lets or hindrances of any sort. These two great movements are the most colossal measures of the well-being of mankind. If you go further than that and remember that these two nations are in very fact akin and are on such friendly terms that we are celebrating 100 years of peace, and, as the prime minister said, any serious differences between us are unthinkable; when you remember, further, that in the future economic forces will play a greater and greater part in the ruling of the world, and that guns and the whims of rulers will play less and less; remembering these measures for the upbuilding of mankind and the preservation of the peace of the world, let your imagination play, whether you are concerned in statesmanship or in trade, with the future, and in the light of those economic considerations it may play in a wide field indeed.

I do heartily thank you and bring you from the great commercial interests of the United States, for which I have the honor to speak, their most cordial greetings.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement showing the documents received and distributed by the Interior Department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

WASHINGTON & INTERURBAN RAILWAY (H. DOC. NO. 859).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Washington & Interurban Railway Co. for the year ended December 31, 1913, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Larkin Club Branch, American Continental League, of Portsmouth, N. H., remonstrating against an appropriation for the celebration of the so-called "One hundred years of peace among English-speaking peoples," which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of 600 members of the Sunday school of the Ryland Methodist Episcopal Church; of 110 members of the Sunday school of the Mount Tabor Methodist Protestant Church; of 115 members of the Sunday school of the Friends Church; and of 10 members of the Mary Harris Armor Loyal Temperance Legion, all of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a resolution adopted by Otter Creek Grange, No. 10, Patrons of Husbandry, of Flasher, N. Dak., which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

Whereas our national debt is less than many of the European countries that are providing cheaper money for the agricultural class of their citizens; and

Whereas our natural resources far exceed any and all of the above-mentioned countries; and

Whereas our local banks within our reach are asking 10 per cent for money loaned on our farms; and

Whereas we believe our soil is able, frugally farmed, to pay a reasonable rate of interest for money invested; and

Whereas the wealth of a nation is in its well-ordered homes: Be it

Resolved, That conditions justify us in calling upon Congress to provide redress of the grievance of expensive money.

That in such appeal we are solely on the defensive.

That we call upon our Congressmen to support the Bathrick bill (H. R. 11897), believing it to be a step toward justice.

That to refuse to pass or to oppose any bill that is for the common good and in equity to the detriment of none is, negatively, class legislation of a pernicious type.

Respectfully submitted.

C. S. VAN DYKE,
N. H. WHITCOMB,
A. O. WEEKES,
Committee.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of 65 citizens of Oberon, N. Dak., and a petition of 110 citizens of New Rockford, N. Dak., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WORKS. I present a memorial from the Los Angeles Grain Exchange, of California, remonstrating against the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause in the Panama Canal act, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the people of California and the Pacific coast have looked forward to the completion of the Panama Canal in the belief that its construction through a territory under the sovereignity of the American Government would result in a practical extension of the coast line of the United States from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean, thus resulting in the freedom of trade throughout the United States untrammeled by canal tolls or other forms of restrictions of trade; and

Whereas Congress has passed an act exempting American shipping engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls for passing through the Panama Canal, thus carrying out the expectations of the people of the Pacific coast for the same privileges in the matter of coastwise trade that are possessed by shipping engaged in trade between American ports on the Atlantic coast, which act received the approval of the President after it had been approved by all the commercial bodies of the Pacific coast and a large proportion of the commercial bodies and people of the entire country; and

Whereas Great Britain has entered a protest against said act exempting American shipping from the payment of tolls upon the ground that it is in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

Whereas said treaty was enacted at a time when this country had no rights on the Isthmus of Panama and possessed no territory in that section, and it was contemplated that the canal was to be constructed through foreign territory; and

Whereas the United States, subsequent to the enactment of that treaty, secured from the Government of the Republic of Panama a strip of territory 10 miles in width from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which strip of territory is as much a part of the territory of the United States as any part of continental United States; and

Whereas the shipping of no foreign country has ever been permitted to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, and all regulation of such traffic has been the exclusive province of the United States Government, in which no foreign government has ever before assumed to have rights to control: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this meeting of directors of the Los Angeles Grain Exchange enters its earnest protest against the proposed surrender to Great Britain upon a matter which, in our opinion, is purely one of domestic concern and regulation; be it further

Resolved, That we earnestly urge the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in the Congress of the United States to stand firmly upon the rights of the United States to regulate its own coastwise commerce by the exemption of payment of tolls or any other form of tribute, and to oppose and vote against the proposed repeal of the exemption from the payment of tolls of American shipping engaged in the coastwise trade.

[SEAL.] (Signed) LOS ANGELES GRAIN EXCHANGE,
By O. H. GIBBONS, Secretary.

Mr. WORKS. I presented a memorial of the Young Men's Republican Club of Los Angeles County, Cal., on the same subject, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YOUNG MEN'S REPUBLICAN CLUB OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY,
Los Angeles, Cal., March 19, 1914.

Resolutions.

Whereas the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives has recommended the passage of a bill repealing free tolls for American ships engaging in coastwise trade; and

Whereas the President and the leaders of the Democratic Party are trying to force this bill through Congress, thereby repealing one of the planks of their party platform; and

Whereas such action on the part of Congress would be a death blow to the American merchant marine, a permanent burden to the Pacific coast, and a serious handicap to the entire country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sentiment of the Young Men's Republican Club of Los Angeles County that the Panama Canal belongs to the American people, and that the American people, who spent $400,000,000 to build this canal, should reap the greatest possible benefit to accrue from its opening, even though such action on their part should offend some foreign power or powerful corporations, and that this organization is unalterably opposed to the repeal of free tolls; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent by the secretary, in the name of this organization, to Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States; to United States Senators JOHN D. WORKS and GEORGE C. PERKINS; and to Representatives WILLIAM D. STEPHENS, CHARLES BELL, and JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND.

[Telegram.]

LOUISVILLE, KY., March 23, 1914.

Senator OLLIE JAMES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We, the officers of Jefferson County Fedcration of Catholic Societies, in special meeting assembled in Louisville, wish to register our protest, in name of 65,000 Catholics of this county, against the pending immigration bill as to the literacy test, whereas such measure is too restrictive, proscriptive, unreasonable, and un-American.

THOMAS J. DOLAN, Secretary.
DR. PETER S. GANZ, President.

Mr. JAMES. I present a resolution adopted at a meeting of the councils of the Daughters of America in Louisville and other cities in Kentucky, advocating the passage of the immigration bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved by the councils of the Daughters of America in Louisville, Newport, Covington, Latonia, Dayton, Ky., etc., That we place ourselves on record as most heartily indorsing the Smith-Burnett immigration bill, including the literacy test. We regard the literacy test as the most practical means of checking the thousands of undesirable persons annually coming to our shores. The House of Representatives by a vote of 202 to 126 have passed the Smith-Burnett immigration bill, H. R. 6060, which has incorporated within it the literacy test. The bill is now pending before the Senate of the United States. We desire to congratulate each and every Congressman who so courageously cast his vote for the passage of this bill, and we most earnestly appeal to the patriotism of the Senators of the United States to immediately enact into law this measure.

We also very earnestly petition the President of the United States, Hon. Woodrow Wilson, when this bill is presented to him for his official consideration, that he act in the interest of the great masses of the American people by attaching his signature thereto.

Be it resolved, That the secretary send a copy of this resolution to each of the United States Senators from Kentucky and also a copy to the President of the United States.

State Councilor.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a petition and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the petition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the reading of the petition, which is one in relation to the repeal of the law exempting our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls at Panama, I will say that I have no doubt there will be thousands and thousands of lengthy petitions, many of them argumentative, in relation to this entire subject, and many Senators will ask that they be printed in the RECORD. These petitions are largely duplicates. They are sent out by people who are interested in the question upon the one side or the other, and if they are all to be printed they will utterly overwhelm and swamp the RECORD. I do not know what course may be taken in regard to them, but I think now is the time, in advance, for the Senate to determine whether it is going to allow all the petitions that Senators ask to have printed in the RECORD to be printed in the RECORD or whether it is not going to allow any of them to be printed in the RECORD.

I raise the question at this time because personally I do not think the RECORD ought to be made the vehicle of masses of newspaper comments, editorials, arguments, and petitions. I do not feel like objecting when any one Senator asks to have a petition of that nature put in the RECORD upon either side of the question. I want to be perfectly fair about it, and I think the Senate wants to be perfectly fair about it.

The only reason why I suggest that this petition be read is because the petitioners themselves request that it be printed in the RECORD. It is a petition from citizens of my State. If I ask to have it printed in the RECORD I do not want to object to some other Senator when he asks that petitions upon the other side of the question may be printed in the RECORD. I am perfectly willing to abide by whatever decision the Senate makes, if it cares to make any in the matter.

My personal opinion, as I said before, is that it is exceedingly unwise to cumber the RECORD and stretch and bulge it out of all proportion by the printing of petitions and lengthy arguments upon controverted subjects. Of course, the right of petition is sacred and always will be; it is guaranteed under our Constitution. Petitons should be received and, in my judgment, referred to the proper committees of Congress. Other Senators have already had petitions read here, notably the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who on yesterday put telegrams and other documents into the RECORD on this question. The petition I present is upon the same side of the question that the junior Senator from New York read articles upon, and is upon another side of the question from the one which I took when this matter was up before.

I will say now, if I may be allowed, with the indulgence of the Senate—for we are proceeding by unanimous consent—that I voted before against exempting any ship from the payment of tolls that might pass through the canal. That is my belief as an economic policy of the Government, and if I live—and I hope to, in my usual health—I shall vote the same way if the question comes before the Senate again, because I have not changed my mind, and I do not change my vote unless I change my mind.

I ask that this petition be read by the Secretary, because the petitioners ask me to make the request—and I hope the privilege will be accorded, because it has been accorded to other Senators—but I ask no other rule applied to me on my motion that the Senate is not willing to apply to all equally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The resolutions were read and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., March 15, 1914.

At the regular meeting of the Rev. W. A. Harty Branch of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, assembled to do honor to the martyr patriot, Robert Emmet, we, the 600 members of the above-named branch, proclaim anew our allegiance to this great Republic, in which so many of our people have found a home and to which they have given loyal and unstinted service from the Revolutionary struggle to the present day, coloring its battle fields with their blood and contributing their full share to the building of the strength and prosperity which have made it the greatest power on earth.

We claim to have earned the right to full citizenship given us by the law of the land, and which has ever been exercised unselfishly for the welfare and glory of these United States and the promotion and extension of the principles of government as established by the Father of our Republic.

We resent the attempt of a section of the daily press, inspired by foreign influence and acting for English interests, to restrict and limit our citizenship to the mere act of voting and to misrepresent our motives to our fellow citizens.

In civil life as well as in war our race have done their full duty to these United States, and never has that duty been more loyally performed than in our warnings, based on our better, more intimate, and more recent knowledge of English methods, who now seek by the insidious wiles of British diplomacy under the mask of peace to entangle our Government in the quarrels and rivalries of the Old World.

We congratulate Senator JAMES A. O'GORMAN, and Representatives UNDERWOOD, MANN, DOREMUS, KNOWLAND, KAHN, and MURDOCK for their true American spirit, manifested by their action on the free-tolls act.

We protest against the repeal of the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act at the dictation or solicitation of England.

We affirm that the free-tolls provision does not violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that England, having openly broken the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by annexing the Belize territory, is not in a position to charge the United States with a breach of national honor. She swept the sea of American commerce during the Civil War, and would now dictate the terms on which American ships are to compete with her ships in an American waterway built with American money.

We also congratulate Senator CHAMBERLAIN for the resolution he introduced into the Senate calling upon Ambassador Walter H. Page for an explanation of his speech in London, in which significant mention is made of the Monroe doctrine and the Panama Canal act; and we as citizens would favor his recall by the President of the United States if his utterances on that occasion were reported correctly by the American press of this country.

Resolved, therefore, That copies of these resolutions be sent to President Woodrow Wilson; Vice President Thomas R. Marshall; Secretary of State William J. Bryan; Hon. WILLIAM STONE; Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker of the House of Representatives; Committee on Foreign Affairs; Committee on Interoceanic Canals; and to the Senators and Representatives from the State of Connecticut, with a request that they be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

T. C. SMITH, Chairman.
J. F. MEEHAN, Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4233) authorizing the payment to the widow of Dorence Atwater of compensation for services rendered the United States of America, submitted an adverse report (No. 373) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 691) for the relief of Simon M. Preston (Rept. No. 375); and

A bill (S. 3808) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis (Rept. No. 374).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1055) for the relief of T. S. Williams, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 380) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4425) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 379) thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred Senate resolution 68, directing the Secretary of Labor to investigate and report upon mortality incident to various wage earners, reported it without amendment (Rept. No. 378).

Mr. BRISTOW, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1216) for the relief of Oakley Pandall, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 376) thereon.

THERESA A. MURRAY.

Mr. BRISTOW. From the Committee on Claims I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 75) for the relief of Theresa A. Murray, and I submit a report (No. 371) thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up for passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the bill?

Mr. WARREN. It is a bill for a payment to the widow of a Forest Service employee who was burned to death in the service of the United States, and who is destitute. Therefore I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to the consideration of this bill, but I give notice that I shall object to further unanimous consents for the consideration of bills, because I should like the Senate to get to the calendar to-day if it is possible to do so.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, can we not have the bill read, so that we shall know what it is before unanimous consent is given for its consideration?

Mr. WARREN. I only ask for the present consideration of the bill because of the distressing circumstances surrounding the beneficiary. This beneficiary is a poor widow, with children, whose husband perished in service of the United States. The man was a forester, and in subduing a forest fire suffered injuries which caused his death.

Mr. JAMES. I have no purpose to object, if it is a proper bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Claims was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Theresa A. Murray, widow of John P. Murray, late assistant forest ranger, who died August 3, 1911, from injuries received while in the performance of his duty and without fault on his part, the sum of $1,100, the amount of one year's salary at the rate of compensation which the said John P. Murray was receiving at the time of his death. And the sum of $1,100 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COST OF LIVING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KENYON. From the Committee on Education and Labor, I report back favorably, with amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 93) authorizing and directing the Department of Labor to make an inquiry into the cost of living in the District of Columbia and to report thereon to Congress as early as practicable, and I submit a report (No. 377) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being an objection, the joint resolution will go to the calendar.

OLD POINT IMPROVEMENT CO.

Mr. BRYAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1495) to compensate the Old Point Improvement Co. for the demolition and removal of the Hygeia Hotel property from the Government reservation at Old Point Va., reported the following resolution (S. Res. 313):

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1495) entitled "A bill to compensate the Old Point Improvement Co. for the demolition and removal of the Hygeia Hotel property from the Government reservation at Old Point, Va., now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. WORKS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4943) to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes," to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 372) thereon. Notwithstanding the statement made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up at this time. It is a matter of urgency, as I will explain, if the Senator from Utah requires that I shall do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator explain the bill.

Mr. WORKS. The bill is intended to allow the Interior Department to exchange lands with a lumber company in the Yosemite Park. The lumber company owns timber lands in that park in a conspicuous place, it has its mills established, and is threatening to slash that timber. Negotiations have taken place between the Interior Department and the lumber company, by which they have agreed that that land, which is of great importance to the park as a part of its beauty, may be transferred for other timber lands further in the park and avoid the destruction of that timber. The company, being ready to proceed, is restless about it; it has been delayed so long that it is threatening to go on, and has a perfect right to go on, and destroy that timber. Therefore I think it quite important, in the interest of the park, that this bill should be speedily passed; and I hope that under those circumstances the Senator from Utah will not object to its consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. On the statement of the Senator from California I shall not object; but I wish to say that I think the Senator from California is in full sympathy with the position taken by many Senators here, that we ought to get to the consideration of the calendar.

Mr. WORKS. I am in sympathy with the Senator from Utah in that respect, and I should not ask for the consideration of this bill if it were not regarded as a matter of urgency.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but I have this morning reported a joint resolution which is also a matter of some urgency, to which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] objected, he having announced that he would object to the consideration of any other business. I only want to call his attention to the discrimination which he is practicing toward the membership of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Iowa to think that I had, nor had I, any intention to make any discriminations. If the Senator's resolution is of an urgent nature and the defeat of its passage to-day will do any harm whatever to the Government or to anybody else, I will withdraw my objection to its consideration; but from what the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has said the bill reported by him relates to an urgent matter. It is for that reason, and that reason only, that I did not interpose an objection to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stats., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes," so as to read as follows:

SECTION 1. That the Secretaries of the Departments of Interior and Agriculture, for the purpose of eliminating private holdings within the Yosemite National Park and to preserve intact timber along and adjoining the roads in the scenic portion of the park on patented lands, are hereby empowered in their discretion to obtain and accept for the United States a complete title to any and all patented lands within the boundaries of said park by the exchange of timber or timber and lands within the Yosemite National Park and the Sierra and Stanislaus National Forests for such lands and the timber thereon within the park, necessary conveyances of park and national forest timber or timber and lands to be made by said Secretaries, respectively. That the Secretaries of the said departments may, and are hereby authorized to, acquire title in fee by the exchange of lands of the United States for patented lands not exceeding 640 acres in the Sierra and Stanislaus National Forests, adjacent and contiguous to the Yosemite National Park, and when such patented lands are thus acquired said lands shall become a part of the Yosemite National Park and be subject to all the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In pursuance of the notice which I gave on yesterday I submit a resolution which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 315) was read as follows:

Resolved, That when the unfinished business has by unanimous consent been temporarily laid aside and the Senate has thereafter, either by unanimous consent or by motion made and carried, proceeded to the consideration of another question, such subsequent action shall not displace the unfinished business, although at the time of adjournment the other question may not have been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

I desire to have the address printed as a public document, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it so printed.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS—ADDRESS OF EX-SENATOR FORAKER.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, Hon. Joseph B. Foraker was for some time a Member of this body and also a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He recently delivered a speech on the subject of the Panama Canal tolls, which is now before the Senate, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

The speech referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. J. B. FORAKER, ON THE PANAMA CANAL, BEFORE THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF CLEVELAND, OHIO, MARCH 17, 1914.

Mr. President and gentlemen, it was a simple fact that the battleship Oregon had to sail around Cape Horn to join her sister battleships in resisting Cervera's fleet; but it was an object lesson that precipitated the building of the Panama Canal as a culmination of 400 years of study and discussion of methods to establish interoceanic communication across the Isthmus.

Although repeated efforts were made to find and construct some kind of interoceanic communication nothing was attempted beyond the most primitive methods, such as foot paths, pack-horse trails, and wagon roads, until in 1819 the Spanish Cortez authorized the construction of a canal; but all efforts under this authority were abandoned before anything was accomplished, when in 1823, four years later, Spain lost her dependencies in Central and South America.

The French made a number of efforts, but all failed.

The United States Government commenced, early in the nineteenth century, taking steps to make surveys and to locate feasible routes and to provide for the construction somewhere of a communication between the two oceans, to be financed, constructed, and controlled by private corporations.

By comparison of relative merits, all routes dropped out of serious consideration in time except the Nicaragua and the Panama; and, largely because of sanitary conditions, the Nicaragua route was generally regarded more favorably than the Panama route.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER CONVENTION.

This was the situation when in 1850 practical efforts were made by some parties to organize a company to build a canal over the Nicaragua route. The effort failed, but it directed public attention to the subject and led to some important and far-reaching results, among others to the Clayton-Bulwer convention of April 19, 1850, by which England and the United States jointly undertook to protect any private company that might undertake such construction. Up to that time no such thing as a governmental construction of such a canal had been seriously thought of. And no such canal was then contemplated by either party to the convention. On the contrary, the provisions of this treaty carefully provided against either Government ever at any time acquiring any control over such a canal.

In the first article it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties would "ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal." They further agreed that neither would "erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any domain over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America."

By the sixth article it was provided that the contracting parties should invite all other friendly Governments to become parties to the convention.

By the eighth article it was recited that it was the purpose of the contracting parties not only to "accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle"; and that accordingly they agreed to extend their protection to any other interoceanic communication whether by canal or railway; and that such interoceanic communication when constructed should be "open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms," and "also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

The effort to build the particular canal in contemplation at the time when the Clayton-Bulwer convention was entered into, failed for want of capital, and its charter was forfeited. All other like efforts—and there were a number of them—sooner or later met with a similar fate, so that nothing beyond mere attempt and partial performance was ever accomplished during its existence. During all this period Great Britain never even suggested that she would be pleased to construct such a canal, either by herself alone or in copartnership with us; nor did she during all this period take any step of any kind to "facilitate" or in any way encourage the construction of such a canal by any private company.

A CHANGE OF PLANS.

The great success of De Lesseps at Suez inspired all with confidence that he would be successful at Panama.

When his failure forfeited that confidence it was transferred, in a modified way, to the new French Panama Canal Co., which succeeded him, and for a time gave hope that it would complete the work he had undertaken; but this hope had been practically abandoned when the Spanish American War came on, and the object lesson was given of the Oregon having to pass at a time of great national anxiety, when every day was thought to be of vital importance, from the Pacific to the Atlantic side of our country by way of the Cape, thus consuming weeks, without a canal, instead of hours with a canal for such passage. The result was the excitement of an almost universal sentiment in favor of the immediate construction by the United States Government of such a canal for the primary purpose of national defense, and for such commercial use as might be found consistent therewith.

While a sentiment had been developing for some years in favor of a canal strictly American and entirely under American auspices and control, this was the first time it had ever been seriously proposed or contemplated to make such a canal a Government work.

All previous treaties, legislation, plans, and efforts had reference to private companies and private capital invested and controlled by corporations, for which no government assumed, or was to assume, in any contingency, any financial responsibility whatever.

It was also the first time the idea of national defense had been in the American mind the primary and dominant purpose, and commerce only a secondary and incidental purpose of such construction.

We had learned from our experience with Spain how vital it was to our national success if we should unhappily become involved in war with a strong naval power such as England, Germany, France, Japan, or Russia to be able to transfer our battleships quickly from one ocean coast to the other and to have facilities for such transfer absolutely in our own hands and under our own control in every respect.

Few stopped, except in an incidental way, to consider how much it would cost or whether the commercial aspects were such as to warrant the belief that the revenues of the canal from such a source would be profit paying, or even sufficient to pay operating expenses. Every consideration of that character was incidental and subordinate.

This is an important point in the canal evolution, not only because it involved a radical change in our plans and purposes, but also because it marks a like change in the literature of the subject. On this account many of the statements, phrases, and provisions employed in previous treaties, conventions, and correspondence became thenceforth obsolete, and inapplicable to the present discussion.

Until that time all our literature on the subject and all our official action with respect to it contemplated a canal owned by somebody else, of which we would be only users in common with other nations, and our relation to which would be, for that reason, the same as the relation to it of all other countries, while from that time forward our official action and literature have had reference mainly to a canal owned by ourselves, and only by ourselves, and a canal therefore as to which our relation is not like that of other nations, but unlike that of every other nation.

Speaking on this point, Hon. Richard C. Olney, in an address before the American Society of International Law, April 25, 1913, said:

> The different phases of American public and official sentiment respecting the canal are noteworthy, and not to be overlooked in construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.
> While the United States was expecting to be merely one of the users of the canal, it strenuously insisted upon equality of rules and charges for the use of the canal, and did not concern itself about the rights of the canal owner.
> When the rôle of builder and owner of the canal was forced upon it, it as strenuously insisted upon complete ownership and complete control and complete elimination of all foreign participation or control.

It was recognized that to authorize us to make this change in our plans we must cut loose from the Clayton-Bulwer convention with its entanglements, and from all the previous obligations, expressions, and engagements that had been made on account of it, and all that we had formed a fixed purpose to do.

THE FIRST HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

Such was the state of both public and official sentiment when on the 5th day of February, 1900, President McKinley sent to the Senate for ratification what is known in Panama Canal history as the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

As soon as its terms became known, there was both in Congress and outside, in the newspapers and elsewhere, and everywhere, an instant outburst of expressions of dissatisfaction.

There were three principal objections, all inconsistent with the conclusions and program already mentally adopted as above indicated. Stated in a word, they were:

In the first place, a failure to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer convention.

In the second place, it provided for an invitation to all the other powers to "adhere to it." In other words, become parties to it and thus in a sense copartners with us; and, in the third place, it expressly prohibited the erection of fortifications "commanding the canal or the waters adjacent."

As to fortifications, it was proper for reasons already indicated to prohibit them in the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and also in the case of the Suez Canal, and all previously proposed isthmian canals, because in every instance they were to be constructed, owned, and operated by private corporations. No such corporation would have any right or power to erect and maintain fortifications. That is a strictly governmental function. Such a company could fortify only through the agency and in the name of some government, and to fortify in that way would be to put that government in control of the privately owned canal, and thus give it an advantage over all other countries using it.

The invitation for other governments "to adhere," while proper for a privately owned money-making canal that had no reference to national defense and wanted all the business it could get, was utterly at variance with our purpose to build by the Government directly a canal primarily for national defense and, therefore, of necessity without copartnership with anybody.

The proposition to merely modify the Clayton-Bulwer convention was especially distasteful not only because the change of plan made it inapplicable, but also for other reasons I shall state presently.

It was December, 1900, before the Senate was able to take final action. It then ratified the treaty, but so amended as to obviate all these objections.

As thus amended, Great Britain refused to accept the treaty and did it so curtly that for a time further negotiations seemed impossible. An early and amicable adjustment of differences was most desirable, but the intention and determination of our Government not to yield its right and purpose to build a canal of the character above mentioned continued unchanged. This situation led to a careful consideration of the question how, if agreement continued impossible, our hands might be otherwise untied.

In this connection it was recalled that there had been a number of violations of the Clayton-Bulwer convention by Great Britain. Among them one so flagrant and defiant that President Pierce, in his annual message of December 31, 1855, called attention to it at great length, and, again, this violation being still persisted in, he called attention to it in a message to Congress May 15, 1856, when he used the following language, which sufficiently describes the grave and positive character of the charges made.

He said:

> It was with surprise and regret that the United States learned * * * that a military expedition under the authority of the British Government had landed at San Juan del Norte, in the State of Nicaragua, and taken forcible possession of that port, the necessary terminus of any canal or railway across the Isthmus, within the territories of Nicaragua.
> It did not diminish to us the unwelcomeness of this act on the part of Great Britain to find that she assumed to justify it on the ground of an alleged protectorship of a small and obscure band of uncivilized Indians whose proper name had even become lost to history, who did not constitute a state capable of territorial sovereignty, either in fact or in right, and all political interest in whom and in the territory they occupied Great Britain had previously renounced by successive treaties with Spain when Spain was sovereign to the country and subsequently with independent Spanish America.

It was further recalled that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations of the Fifty-first Congress had made a careful investigation of the whole subject in connection with the consideration of the canal then proposed to be constructed over the Nicaragua route by the Maritime Canal Co., and as a result had unanimously agreed upon a report January 10, 1891, from which I quote as follows:

> We think it can be justly affirmed that the convention of 1850 has become obsolete. * * *
> One of the provisions of the convention of 1850 most important to the United States and to the preservation of the republican governments on this continent was that which declared that neither party to the convention should "occupy or fortify or colonize or assume to exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America."
> At that time the "settlement" of British subjects, as it was called, at the Belize, on the coast of Central America, was of the smallest dimensions and had no substance or form of a territorial dominion. British woodcutters were there under an ancient Spanish license of timber cutting, and nothing more. * * *
> "This was substantially the condition of things when the convention of 1850 was entered into.
> "The next step taken after the convention of 1850 was in 1853, when a legislative assembly was constituted to manage the affairs of the settlement. This was followed by a convention between Great Britain and Guatemala in 1859 for the establishment of the boundaries between what the treaty chose to call 'Her Britannic Majesty's settlement and possessions in the Bay of Honduras' and the territories of Guatemala. * * * By this treaty that which was before a licensed industrial establishment became instantly a possession of the British Crown. The settlement government continued until 1862, when the settlement was declared a colony of the British Crown and a regular colonial establishment was set on foot; and so from that time to this the form and substance of a regular colonial government as a part of Her Majesty's dominions has continued. It is understood that its geographical dominion has been vastly enlarged from the licensed woodcutting limitations and boundaries that existed in 1850. All this has taken place systematically and persistently, notwithstanding the declaration of Her Majesty's Government that it should not 'colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over * * * the Mosquito coast or any port of Central America.' * * *
> "In view of all these considerations the committee is of opinion that the United States is at present under no obligation, measured either by the terms of the convention, the principles of public law, or good morals, to refrain from promoting, in any way that it may deem best for its just interests, the construction of this canal, without regard to anything contained in the convention of 1850."
> This report was signed by every member of the committee. I recite the names because they are a guaranty of wise and conservative statement. They are:
> John Sherman (chairman), George F. Edmunds, William P. Frye, William M. Evarts, J. N. Dolph, John T. Morgan, Joseph E. Brown, H. B. Payne, J. B. Eustis.
> Without further enumerating, it may be stated in a general way that in view of a number of such matters as these, coupled with the fact that since 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer convention was entered into, such changes had come about in the general situation that it was no longer desirable or to the interest of the United States to continue restricted and obligated by the provisions of that convention, and, therefore, according to the rules and principles of international law applicable to such a case, was at liberty, without regard to what had actually transpired in the nature of violations of the treaty, to denounce the same, and thereby finally and absolutely terminate it, a sentiment rapidly developed to take that step, if necessary, and thus put ourselves in a situation to proceed in our own way to work out our own plans without regard to Great Britain or anybody else.

That we had a right to take such action is sustained by all the leading writers on international law and by all distinguished publicists who have dealt with the question, both ancient and modern.

The fact that we had this right which we could resort to, although loath to exercise it because of the offense we might give, is important in view of what has been said recently about the rights Great Britain surrendered when she agreed to the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The truth is she surrendered nothing whatever except only such rights as she had asserted in violation of both the Monroe doctrine and the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and the additional indefensible right of mere obstruction, and she did not surrender that until we had reached the point where we were no longer in a humor to be unduly delayed by its exercise.

I happen to know that Mr. Hay was familiar with this situation and this sentiment and purpose. Doubtless the British Government had the same knowledge.

At any rate negotiations were suddenly renewed, with the result that on the 4th day of December, 1901, President Roosevelt sent to the Senate what is known as the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

By this treaty Great Britain yielded all that was involved in the amendments made by the Senate to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and on the 16th day of December, 1901, it was ratified by the Senate without amendment.

Ratifications were in due time exchanged and the treaty went into full force and effect. Thereupon appropriate legislation was enacted under which we acquired the rights of the new French Panama Canal Co. and the Canal Zone.

Instead of acquiring a mere easement the zone was acquired in fee simple, with sole and complete jurisdiction in the United States, in order that, in accordance with the plan and purpose mentioned, we might make the undertaking more completely American and governmental.

With these preliminaries adjusted, and with all necessary legislation enacted providing therefor, the construction was entered upon, and now, at a cost of more than $400,000,000, the canal has been completed and arrangements are in progress to formally open and dedicate it in January, 1915.

It is of majestic character.

But it is not alone in the cost of the canal nor in its vast proportions, nor in its utility, nor in the engineering difficulties that have been so successfully overcome that our great achievements consist. To the everlasting credit of our Government, and particularly to the men representing us in this work, the prior supposed insurmountable difficulties of sanitation have been overcome. Yellow fever has been practically banished, and the zone is to-day the healthiest place to be found anywhere in the tropical regions of the world. This is a distinct and separate contribution of incalculable value to mankind. Surely no nation ever built for itself a nobler monument. The people of the United States have a right to be proud of it, and no part of the people of the United States have a better right to share in that pride than the people of Cleveland, for throughout all the great work of preparing the way by appropriate legislation no one rendered more intelligent, efficient, and conspicuous service than your distinguished fellow townsman, Senator Marcus A. Hanna.

FORTIFICATIONS.

It was in keeping with the dominating idea of national defense that as the canal approached completion it was decided by our Government to erect and maintain there suitable fortifications. It was so announced.

At once there was a protest made by the British Government, which claimed that we had no authority under the treaty to place any forts there, and loud and long were the charges sounded abroad and repeated, parrot like, here at home, that we were violating our solemn agreement and disgracing ourselves before the whole world.

It required some patience to answer such calumny, but that was all.

The mere fact that fortifications had been prohibited in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty and were not prohibited in the second was enough, it would seem, to settle that question in our favor, since manifestly the prohibition was put into the first treaty because it was the opinion of both contracting parties that without such prohibition, as the owner of the canal, our Government would have the right to fortify if it should see fit to do so. The absence of this prohibition from the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty clearly left the right to our discretion.

It is unnecessary, however, to argue that question now, for it was finally conceded that we had the right to fortify if we saw fit to do so.

We are accordingly, at an expense of several millions of dollars, building fortifications and arming and equipping them with the latest, largest, and most efficient guns for the defense of the same in case it may ever be necessary to make such defense.

In due time the President was authorized by the Congress to fix the terms and conditions upon which, so far as tolls were concerned, the canal might be used, and, pursuant to this authority, he determined the respective rates different vessels should pay.

THE EXEMPTION ACT.

Also in the meanwhile, on the 17th day of August, 1912, Congress enacted a law according to the provisions of which American vessels engaged in our coastwise trade are exempted from the payment of any tolls.

When this legislation was first proposed, in the early part of 1912, the British Government, while the bill was yet under consideration, again protested; this time on the ground that such exemption was a discrimination, and as such in violation of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, under which the canal was constructed.

The ground of this protest was that, according to the provisions of the treaty, although the Clayton-Bulwer convention was superseded by the present treaty, the canal was to be constructed, maintained, and operated "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention," and the further provisions found in article 3 of the present treaty that the basis of such neutralization should be in accordance with certain rules, "substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed on the 29th day of October, 1888," for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

After a very thorough and exhaustive discussion the bill was passed and became a law by a very large majority vote in both the Senate and the House.

President Taft signed and approved the bill on the 24th day of August, 1912, and in connection therewith took occasion to prepare and file with the act a "memorandum" expressing his views, setting forth in a strong, forceful way the grounds of his approval.

He was at that time the Republican candidate for reelection to the Presidency.

In the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore on the 2d day of July, 1912, it was declared:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships "engaged in the coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal."

The National Progressive Party in its platform adopted at Chicago on the 7th day of August, 1912, declared:

> The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, "must be used primarily for their benefit" * * * "and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls."

The Republican platform of 1912 made no declaration on the subject, but President Taft's "memorandum," above referred to, was regarded for all the purposes of that campaign as an expression of the position of the Republican Party in so far as its candidate and leader had a right to commit the party to the views he expressed.

It may be said, therefore, that although there had been a strenuous debate in the Congress preceding the passage of the act for the exemption from tolls of American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal, there was no issue whatever on that subject in the campaign of 1912.

It has been pointed out that on at least one occasion during the campaign President Wilson spoke in approval of the plank in his platform as above given.

Subsequent to the election, on the 18th day of January, 1913, ex-President Roosevelt said in an article published in the Outlook:

> I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls.

In view of all this it was thought that in accordance with the American contention it was finally and intelligently settled that we had a right under the treaty to discriminate in favor of our vessels to the extent at least of those engaged in the coastwise trade.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S MESSAGE.

But most unexpectedly the question has been again opened; this time by President Wilson in a message to Congress, which is so short and so important I give it in full:

> Gentlemen of the Congress, I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.
> I have come to ask for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the

coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to you to urge my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a nation to interpret with too strained or refined a reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

It will be noted that the President asks for the repeal of the exemption act on the ground that in his "own judgment" it constitutes a mistaken economic policy, and because, in the second place, it is in "plain contravention" of our treaty obligation, and because, in the third place, notwithstanding our differing opinions here at home, everywhere outside the United States the opinion prevails, as he says, that the treaty "precludes the exemption"; and because "the large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood."

He concludes his message by saying, "I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure."

THE POLICY OF EXEMPTION.

So far as the policy of exemption is concerned, it is not vitally important whether the President is right or wrong. If our right and power to exempt, or not, as we may at any time see fit, were conceded, we could repeal the act and then at any time in the future return to the policy of exemption if we should find by experience that a mistake had been made.

It is hard to understand why Americans should not do for their own shipping interests as much as other countries do for theirs. It is as important to us to have an adequate merchant marine as it is to any other country; so that naturally if conditions were the same we should give as much help to our shipping as other nations extend to theirs; but conditions are unequal. We are at a great disadvantage as compared with our competitors, and therefore the duty to give such aid is correspondingly increased.

Entertaining these views, I have been expecting from the beginning that among the results of the construction of this canal would come, in time, a positive and permanent help for our merchant marine, either through exemption from tolls or by preferential rates. I think I would postpone such help, if I could have my way about it, until the canal is self-supporting, but the right to give such help under proper circumstances should not be surrendered.

On the other hand, the interests of the transcontinental railroads must also be considered. They would suffer more or less from the cheapened water transportation with which they would thus be compelled to compete, and possibly at a time when they might need to have their burdens lightened rather than increased. They are as much as ever essential to our development and defense and must be allowed to prosper.

All conflicting interests and views were taken into consideration in the exhaustive discussion that was had in the Senate and the House preceding the enactment of the exemption law, and it was in all this light that the Congress concluded that it was good policy to enact the legislation now complained of, and that we could do so without violating in any sense whatever any treaty obligation.

FOREIGN OPINION.

So far as foreign opinion is concerned, while always important as affecting our intercourse with other nations, it should not be allowed to compel us to abandon an important right under any circumstances; especially not on the ground that we have wrongfully asserted it, thus condemning ourselves morally. "It is a mean bird that fouls its own nest."

But the President is mistaken in saying that "everywhere," outside of the United States, the opinion prevails that the treaty "precludes the exemption," if he would have us understand from that statement that in other countries there is no difference of opinion on the subject. No doubt a majority of the people of foreign countries have that belief. But there can be at least two reasons suggested why that may be true without making their belief true in fact; in the first place, the great majority of people abroad, as here, and I refer to only intelligent, thoughtful men, have never carefully investigated the subject but have accepted opinions from others, or have formed opinions from superficial, and perhaps, incidental and prejudiced reading.

The subject is a large one; it is not free from difficulty; and it can be understood only by more study and investigation than most men have the time or disposition to undertake.

In the second place, it is to the interest of the rest of the world to adopt the contention of Great Britain, for it is our canal and they not only desire to use it, but to do so in successful competition with us; it is fair to assume, therefore, that self-interest has influenced their judgment quite as much as it may have influenced ours.

At any rate, we should not be arraigned as acting in bad faith, simply because we have decided in favor of ourselves, for our foreign friends are open to the same charge; but, however that may be, there is not unanimity but diversity of opinion abroad, as well as here, with respect to the proper interpretation of the provision of the treaty under consideration.

At least two able and exhaustive arguments by two very eminent British authorities in opposition to the British contention have been widely published, both in England and the United States. One is by Edward S. Cox-Sinclair and the other by C. A. Hereshoff Bartlett, LL. B. Both articles are elaborate, covering the whole case, and presenting every phase of it, and both reach in legal effect the same conclusion. The following quotations from the last-mentioned article will show what that conclusion is:

> The provision of the treaty referred to means that there shall be no discrimination by the United States against any one foreign nation, or its citizens or subjects, in favor of any other foreign nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions of or charges for traffic or otherwise. "On terms of entire equality" refers to the equality extended to all nations other than the United States; that is to say, it is prohibitive of the United States favoring one foreign nation as against another. Its purpose was to provide that vessels of commerce of all nations foreign to the United States should enjoy the same equality among themselves; but this is quite another thing from saying that vessels of commerce of foreign nations shall enjoy the same equality as the vessels of commerce of the United States, and that the Federal Government can not, without infringing the terms of the treaty, extend the free use of the canal even to its own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. What else does the expression "there shall be no discrimination against any such nation" mean? It means that no attempt should be made by the Federal Government to promote the interests of one foreign power to the detriment or exclusion of another; that all foreign nations should stand together equal and alike in the use of the canal.
> On terms of entire "equality" was intended to prevent the United States discriminating in favor of one foreign nation against another foreign nation. The Federal Government was laying down its own rules not for the regulation of its own ships of war and of commerce, but for the ships of war and of commerce of that stranger beyond its port, and it unhesitatingly declared that the canal that might be built under its auspices should be free and open to them on terms of entire equality. No advantage should be obtained by one foreign nation over another foreign nation; there should be no favoritism, no special benefit or privilege extended to one that should not be open alike to all foreign nations. This is what the provision means and nothing more. It would require the interpolation of terms not contained in the treaty itself to sustain any other construction.

Mr. Hannis Taylor quotes Mr. George C. Butte, an eminent German authority on international law as stoutly refuting the English claim. Many other similar quotations might be made, but the limitations of the occasion forbid. I shall, however, add one more. A day or two ago it was published in all our papers that Count von Reventlow, an authority on international law, in a discussion of the question of our right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to exempt our vessels from tolls, said:

> The canal bill interprets the Anglo-American treaty from a certain viewpoint, but it is in no sense an evasion thereof. That the United States had a right to construe the treaty as Taft did can not be doubted.

Whatever the truth may be as to the extent this opinion may be held abroad by individuals it can be confidently asserted that no Government except that of Great Britain has made any protest of any kind, official or otherwise, against our action; and, of course, could not with any kind of decency or propriety make such a protest in view of the fact that they have no rights whatever in the canal, except only such as we may see fit to grant to them upon their complying with the rules and regulations we may prescribe for its use by them.

But all this is of relatively little importance, for if we are not right in our contention, we should not and do not wish to adhere to it; but if, on the other hand, we are right in our contention, we should not yield because of foreign opinion or on any other account, unless there be good and sufficient reason for doing so.

No one would have his Government violate or evade in the slightest degree any kind of treaty obligation, no matter whether fairly entered into or not.

No nation could have any standing among the nations of the world that would consciously violate its obligations. This sentiment is universal. The gentlemen who uphold the British contention have no monopoly of honorable purpose. The question is not ethical, but practical.

Do we have a right to exempt vessels in our coastwise trade? If not, that ends the controversy, and Congress can not too quickly comply with President Wilson's request. The President says exemption is in "plain contravention" of our treaty. The fact that he has been on both sides of the question either refutes him or shows insincerity.

THE BRITISH CONTENTION.

The British contention that we do not have the right is based on the first rule of the third article of the treaty, which provides:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or the charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

If that provision stood alone, looking no further than the face of the language employed, the contention of Great Britain might be maintained, but not rightfully, because the contemporaneous record shows such was not the understanding of either Great Britain or the United States at the time when the treaty was negotiated.

The language relied upon is that "all nations observing these rules," and so forth, shall have a right to use the canal on terms of entire equality, and so forth.

The words "observing these rules" were not in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. They were put into the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty at the suggestion of Lord Lansdowne, representing Great Britain, who stated why he desired to have them inserted in the following language, which has reference to the elimination from the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty of that provision of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty which authorized an invitation to other nations to adhere:

While indifferent as to the form in which the point is met, I must emphatically renew the objections of His Majesty's Government to being bound by stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers. I would therefore suggest the insertion in rule 1, after "all nations," of the words "which shall agree to observe those rules." This addition will impose upon other powers the same self-denying ordinance as Great Britain is desired to accept, and will be an additional security for the neutrality of the canal, which it will be the duty of the United States to maintain.

No one can claim that in this note Lord Lansdowne included the United States among his "other powers," because the entire context, and especially the subject immediately under consideration, proves the contrary, for his language shows that his anxiety was to place in the new treaty words that would secure to Great Britain without question equality with other nations—not with us—in the use of our canal. British diplomacy had not yet reached the stage of demanding equality of tolls with us, although in addition we were bound to bear all the burdens of construction, maintenance, and operation.

The first demand was for equality among those who were entitled to equality, and was granted. The present demand is not for equality, but for rank inequality, to our injury, and should be denied.

The representative of the United States in that negotiation was Mr. John Hay, then Secretary of State. He filed an official "memorandum," giving his understanding of the different provisions of the treaty. Speaking on this particular point, he shows he had the same thought in mind that Lord Lansdowne had expressed.

He says:

In conformity with the Senate's emphatic rejection of article 3 of the former treaty, which provided that the high contracting parties would immediately upon the exchange of ratifications bring it to the notice of other powers and invite them to adhere to it, no such provision was inserted in the draft of the new treaty.

It was believed that the declaration that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality—now that Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility and obligation to enforce and defend its neutrality—would practically meet the force of the objection which had been made by Lord Lansdowne to the Senate's excision of the article inviting the powers to come in, viz, that Great Britain was placed thereby in a worse position than other nations in the case of a war with the United States.

This provision recognizes our ownership and authority, and is intended to relieve the dependent situation of the other nations so acquiring a right by the observance of the rules and regulations we prescribe—something not necessary to our right to use the canal.

If it were otherwise, we might, through failure to observe our own rules, lose our right to use our own property, as any other nation would doing the same thing.

But that is not all. Rule 1 of article 3, above quoted as the basis of the British contention, is but one of six rules that are contained in the same article; and all are taken from the Constantinople convention for the government of the Suez Canal, to the owner of which canal they did not apply, for that owner is a private corporation that has no ships either of commerce or war and has no power or right to fortify or commit acts of war or hostility.

These other rules, so far as they relate to the questions we are considering, are as follows:

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end.

6. The plant, establishments, building, etc., * * * in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, etc.

All these rules are natural, intelligent, and proper when applied to nations who have no rights in the canal, except such as pertain to its use, but utterly out of place when applied to the owner; yet they are all found in the same article with rule 1, which it is claimed prohibits exemption of our vessels from tolls. They are all adopted for the same purpose, and for that reason thus grouped together. The one can not apply to us any more than the others, but if all apply, then why should we be wasting millions upon fortifications? For under these prohibitions we could not furnish our forts with ammunition or with the guns and other implements of war necessary to their defense; neither could we use our guns to resist a belligerent, for such resistance would involve an act of hostility and an exercise of the right of war, both expressly and explicitly prohibited.

Sir Edward Grey admits in his letter of protest that if one rule of article 3 applies to us, all do, and that these absurd consequences would follow, but seeks to escape by conceding that because of the fact that the canal is located on our own soil we must be allowed to commit acts of belligerency or defense within the canal or the waters adjacent thereto.

His exact language is:

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

But our ownership of the canal territory had not been acquired or even determined upon when the treaty was made; therefore it follows that we must have agreed to prohibit ourselves from all these acts of hostility and war if we located the canal on foreign soil, as it then seemed more than probable we would, for it was not then known that we would be able to acquire more than a mere license or easement. And yet, knowing that in such case we would not be allowed to use them, we carefully reserved the right to build forts and prepare to defend them. Certainly no such construction is permissible, since it would be only sheer imbecility to reserve a right to protect our property only on our own soil, where there would likely be less occasion to resort to acts of war for its "protection" than if it were on foreign soil. The British admission, however, explicitly exempts us from the inhibition of all the rules relative to acts of war or "protection," and that exempts us from all of them.

For neither Sir Edward Grey nor anyone else can make "fish of one and flesh of another," especially such fish and such flesh. Either all the rules of article 3 are applicable to us or none. If none is applicable, then we are not included among the "all nations," and can do as we like with respect to our own.

Again, if the first rule is applicable, then we can not show any favor whatever to either our ships of war or our ships of commerce, either foreign or domestic, or give to ourselves any advantage whatever in either war or in peace.

We could not pass a warship, much less a fleet of them, or a Government transport, even in time of war and dire necessity, except on full payment of tolls.

If this be the proper construction of the treaty, then the United States is in a worse situation with respect to the canal it has built, and is to maintain and operate, than any other nation, since the result must be that, in addition to the burden of first cost, we are bound to forever bear the burden of maintenance and operation without being allowed to share in the use or benefits beyond what all other nations may, which have not borne any such burden in the past, and are not obligated to share any such burden in the future.

If the canal had proven a failure, and we had been compelled to abandon it midway its construction, no one would have contributed a dollar toward our reimbursement; and if its revenues prove insufficient to meet operating expenses, or, if perchance some time in the future, on account of an earthquake or from other cause, it should be destroyed, no one would help us to bear the loss. And we would not expect any such help from any source and would not be entitled to it, because we have proceeded throughout upon the theory that we were building at our own cost and risk in every respect, and that we are so to maintain it, all because the canal is primarily for our own benefit—first for our national defense and secondly for our commerce and other interests.

NEUTRALIZATION.

It does not help that contention, as claimed, to refer to the fact that it is recited in the preamble of this treaty that its purpose was to be accomplished "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention." That reference does not keep the Clayton-Bulwer convention alive or make it applicable. Moreover, that declaration of the preamble is specifically fulfilled by article 3, which expressly states precisely what the neutralization shall be or, rather, what shall be the basis thereof, thus apparently allowing to the United States some latitude.

It is not necessary, however, for the United States to take any liberty with the text of this treaty to uphold our contention, for the six rules that form the basis of neutralization, if literally followed, fully authorize and sustain it.

Nothing in the treaty helps our contention more than this word "neutralization." Its meaning is well understood. It is the same throughout the world and in all works on international law; but if there were doubt as to its meaning, the rules themselves make specific and perfectly plain what the contracting parties intended.

The well-defined and established primary meaning of "neutralization" has reference to conditions of war and the rights and duties of belligerents. It will not be disputed that as to five of the six rules its meaning is the same it has ordinarily, and therefore the same as it has when applied to a neutral port. There can not be any neutral port unless there are belligerents, and there are no belligerents in time of peace—only in time of war.

Neutrality means the equal treatment of the belligerents compared one with another, but not the equal treatment of belligerents with the nation to which the neutral port may belong. Assuming the United States to be the neutral nation, we could not show favor to one or the other of warring nations without violating the rules of international law applicable, and thus laying ourselves liable to be called to account by the injured belligerent. There is nothing in the treaty to indicate that the word as used was to have any other than its ordinary meaning, and this ordinary meaning has no reference to peace or the conditions of peace, but only war and the conditions of war; but if we are to extend its application to rule 1 and make it apply to tolls in time of peace as well as in time of war, then, according to all rules of construction, neutrality in such new use would mean equal treatment accorded by the neutral nation to other nations, just as it does in every instance under its familiar application.

It is impossible to think of any case of neutrality or "neutralization," whether peaceful or warlike, without at least three parties being concerned, the neutral, who has no interest in the controversy, and the parties thereto who are entitled to equal treatment as between themselves, and receiving that, have no claim of any kind against the neutral.

All things considered, the British contention is not only utterly untenable, but also utterly unjust.

And yet, notwithstanding, it may be good policy at this time, or become good policy at some other time, to recede from the exercise of our right of exemption, and perhaps we should do so on the President's recommendation if he would not require us at the same time to abandon our claim of power and write ourselves down as having been willing to violate our sacred obligations or of having been so stupid that we did not understand them.

Placed on the ground that we have no right of exemption under the treaty, the action we are asked to take is of the most serious character.

It not only means self-condemnation, but it also means the abandonment for all time of a right which in the vicissitudes of our national life may, under changed circumstances, be of value far beyond what we can now realize or appreciate.

If we can not thus favor our coastwise shipping, which no foreign shipping can compete with, of course, no such favor can be allowed to our ships engaged in foreign trade, and as a result no advantage whatever arises to our shipping of any class out of this great national work.

On the other hand, the exercise of this right to show favor to our own ships in the use of our own property would go far toward obviating the necessity of resorting to subsidies, against which there is so much prejudice that the proposition to abandon exemption and pay the tolls, and then have the Government rebate the amounts paid in whole or in part in the nature of subsidies, has been assailed as a dishonest evasion of our treaty obligations, although nearly every nation whose ships sail through the Suez Canal has either in part or in full resorted to the same method of lifting from such ships the burden of tolls they are required to pay—among these nations Great Britain herself.

If we recede from the position we have taken, and ever reach the point where, as a relief against the tolls, our vessels may be required to pay, our Government shall undertake to subsidize it may be safely assumed that we shall then hear another growl from the British lion; for if they are to be allowed to dictate with respect to the use of our canal to the extent now demanded, it will be found the more we yield the more we will have to yield.

Sir Edward Grey has given us fair warning of all this in his letter of protest. Speaking on this point, he tells us:

> Unless the whole volume of shipping which passed through the canal, and which benefits all equally by its services, is taken into account, there are no means of determining whether the tolls chargeable upon a vessel represent that vessel's fair proportion of the current expenditure properly chargeable against the canal; that is to say, interest on the capital expended in construction and the cost of operation and maintenance. If any classes of vessels are exempted from tolls in such a way that no receipts from such ships are taken into account in the income of the canal, there is no guaranty that the vessels upon which tolls are being levied are not being made to bear more than their fair share of the upkeep. Apart altogether, therefore, from the provision in rule 1 about equality of treatment for all nations, the stipulation that the tolls shall be just and equitable, when rightly understood, entitles His Majesty's Government to demand, on behalf of British shipping, that all vessels passing through the canal, whatever their flag or their character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls.
> * * * If the effect of the method chosen for granting such subsidy would be to impose upon British or other foreign shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal, the United States would not have a right to grant such a subsidy.

This language means we not only have no right to exempt any of our vessels, not even our warships or Government transports, from the payment of the same tolls that the ships of all other nations may be required to pay, but that in addition thereto we are to be limited in the collection of tolls to such amount as may be sufficient for the "upkeep" of the canal, and this "upkeep" is defined to be "interest on the capital expended in the construction and the cost of operation and maintenance."

What margin of profit will be allowed and how much we will be permitted to expend for operation and maintenance are not stated.

Neither does he allow us in the program he thus lays down to set aside anything for a sinking fund with which to retire the four hundred millions of bonds our Government has issued.

When it is remembered that the tolls collected for passing through the Suez Canal, which cost only one-fourth of what this canal has cost us, are much higher than the tolls prescribed for the use of our canal; and when it is further remembered that the only limitation found in the treaty upon the amount of tolls to be fixed is that they shall be "just and reasonable," this kind of language amounts to a species of effrontery that it would be difficult to exaggerate.

It forecasts all kinds of trouble, annoyance, vexation, and exasperation with respect to the maintenance, operation, and use of our canal, if, instead of rebuking it, we complacently yield, for he plainly states that "all vessels passing through the canal, whatever their flag or their character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of tolls." This means that every United States battleship must be counted, every Government transport must be counted, every other American ship must be counted, and the amount of tolls collected therefrom shall be the subject of an accounting, which Great Britain will have a right to supervise and take exception to at her pleasure, and that if any subsidies are paid they, too, shall be reported, examined, and passed upon, lest perchance she be required to pay more than her share.

The dispatches from Washington tell us of the expenditure of many thousands of dollars in support of a propaganda started by the Carnegie endowment for international peace to help secure the repeal of the exemption act in the interest of international peace. This is an even greater blunder than the policy of "watchful waiting." Both alike may postpone, but neither can permanently prevent a rightful settlement. Neither policy secures peace; both threaten war—men will not submit to injustice; neither will nations.

It has been suggested that our differences should be arbitrated; that they are measured by tolls exempted or tolls paid, only a matter of dollars and cents. Such a suggestion ignores the serious nature of the trouble.

The question is of vital interest. We are not required by any arbitration treaty ever entered into to submit it to The Hague or any other tribunal, and would be foolish to do so unless so required if "everywhere" outside of the United States it has already been decided against us.

It relates to the national defense, and the time may come, and at no distant day in the future, when the very life of the Nation may depend upon the action we are now to take.

We should not be willing to make such a sacrifice unless we are convinced that we are in the wrong, or unless in some honorable way we are to receive an adequate consideration therefor. If I have spoken to any purpose, it must appear that we are not in the wrong.

What, then, is the consideration we are to receive? Does anybody except the President know? Doubtless Mr. Bryan knows; and I imagine that the Hon. John Bassett Moore knows; and that it was this knowledge that cost this Nation at a critical time the loss of his invaluable service.

But I prefer not to speculate upon that or any other matter that concerns any personality.

And yet if it be proper to consider the opinion that prevails "everywhere" outside of England and the United States, and very generally in both of these countries, allow me to read, as a fair index of what that opinion is, a few words from that distinguished German whose name I have already mentioned in another connection.

I quote further from Count von Reventlow as reported in the daily press. Speaking of President Wilson's message to Congress he is reported as saying:

> The conclusion seems well grounded that the attitude of the British Government concerning Benton's murder and Wilson's announcement yesterday stand in the relation of cause and effect. It will be interesting to see how public opinion in England likes the idea of getting the tolls paragraph removed in exchange for a murdered Englishman.

If such an opinion as this obtains "everywhere," or to any considerable extent with everybody outside of the United States, then surely if we are to be governed by foreign opinion at all, or if there be any basis for such a charge, even a "gentleman's agreement," the Congress should not do what is proposed, but should indignantly refuse to become a party to such a transaction; and if there be no basis for such a charge, then the President owes it to himself and to the whole American people to make a sufficient disclosure of the facts to exonerate himself and this great Nation from the charge of participation in such an unworthy and unpatriotic performance. He should make it plain that he would not for an instant entertain the thought of such bargaining for the support of any policy, foreign or domestic, no matter what; especially not for his Mexican policy, which a great many of his own party, including some of his ablest leaders, and practically "everybody" in all the other parties, regard as a bloody blunder from the beginning down to the present moment.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a motion in the nature of a resolution coming over from a preceding day. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the motion may go over for the day without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion will go over without prejudice.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution (S. Res. 312) by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, calling for certain information in regard to expenditures, and so forth, on rivers and harbors in the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the resolution may be permitted to go over for the day without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, before action is taken on that resolution I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some letters I have received, not because of the references in the letters to myself but because they show the sentiment that pervades the heart of the plain, ordinary American citizen. These letters are taken from many I have received, and they are about as mild in terms as any that have come to me, although in some instances they are expressed in vigorous Anglo-Saxon language that is characteristic of the ordinary American citizen. I have here a letter from Boston, Mass., dated March 23, but before reading it I want to say that I watched with expectation this morning for a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the resolution introduced by me which was referred to it a few days ago, and I was very much disappointed that the resolution was not reported by the committee. Probably it has taken a little more time than we expected would be necessary to consider that matter, but I have no doubt that a report will be forthcoming in the very near future.

The letter to which I have referred is as follows:

20 HIGHLAND STREET,
Boston, March 23, 1914.

MY DEAR SENATOR: A Massachusetts Democrat wants to thank you for the able and courageous fight you are making not only for the whole people of the country but for the future of the American marine.

I see by current newspaper reports that Mr. Wilson, in criticism of your attitude, said that you were skating on thin ice. You stand, Mr. Senator, not with an Executive who has betrayed his party's platform and his personal words as enunciated in one of his New Jersey speeches, but with the great rank and file of the American people, whose eyes are on you in the fight. Mr. Taft stood for toll exemption; Mr. Roosevelt and the Progressive Party stood for the same; the Democratic platform declared for it at Baltimore; and the American people—formerly including Mr. Wilson—have indorsed the same.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to inquire what is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate resolution 312.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What resolution is that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is that my resolution, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought the resolution was called up, and I was going to ask for the disposition of it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, proceeding with the reading of the letter—

> It may be skating on thin ice to stand with the American people, Mr. Senator, but that charge comes in poor form from the man who repudiates his party's platform and violates his campaign pledges. Mr. Wilson obtained my vote and millions like me by false pretenses, Mr. Senator. Were there a referendum and recall in Federal officials I would vote to have Mr. Wilson's future activities confined to the classic shades of Princeton and not to a wholesale autocratic * * * and bulldozing of the regularly elected Members of a United States Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Washington vouch for the writer?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Washington whether he knows the writer of that letter?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not know who the writer of the letter is, but I assume he is simply a plain, ordinary American citizen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. The Chair has some rights here. The Chair asked the Senator from Washington whether he yielded to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming first addressed the Chair, and the Chair asked the Senator from Washington whether he yielded to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the Senator from Wyoming in a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Illinois for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I did not know the Senator from Wyoming was on the floor. A Senator stood just between us and I did not see that he had risen and addressed the Chair, or I would not have interrupted under any conditions, and certainly not under conditions that appeared discourteous. I desire to ask the Senator from Washington if he knows the writer of that letter which he has now read into the RECORD which criticizes the President and assumes that he should be recalled?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, of course I do not know the writer of this letter. He gives his address, his street, and number; he is not afraid to do so. I have no doubt that he is simply a plain, ordinary American citizen, exercising the right of every American citizen to criticize a public official in a position that he does not think is right. Now I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The time for my question, perhaps, has passed. I was going to ask the Senator from Washington if that is one of the "real mild" letters to which he refers?

Mr. JONES. It is. These letters which I have are not from societies of any kind. They do not appear to flow from race prejudice or anything of that sort.

I have here a letter from Booneville, Mo., on the letterhead of the Central Missouri Horticultural Association. It is signed by Charles C. Bell as secretary:

BOONEVILLE, MO., March 19, 1914.

Senator JONES, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I read with much interest in this morning's Globe-Democrat your speech asking information of the President concerning the canal tolls. Your position is right—not only right, but it is truly patriotic and American. I wish to send congratulations.

While I have no personal acquaintance with you, the fact that our oldest daughter—married last April (Mrs. Stanly Piper)—is now a resident of your State (Bellingham, Wash.) makes me take additional interest in your speech.

With best wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours, CHAS. C. BELL.

Then I have a letter from Covington, Ky., dated March 20, 1914:

COVINGTON, KY., March 20, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to compliment you on your stand with regard to the Panama tolls exemption controversy. You seem to have hit the nail on the head and I feel sure your interpretation of the sudden change of front on the part of administration officials is correct. The great trouble with many of our Congressmen and Senators is that they do not look beyond the immediate present and can not or will not see through the thin veil of certain moves merely intended by skilled diplomats to accomplish far greater and more vital ends and bring about irreparable loss to this country. Where is the need for such apparent haste in passing the tolls measure? Why not defer all action until an opportunity can be had to feel the pulse of the American people and ascertain their just indignation over the proposed course of the present administration? There is no question but that we are treading on mighty dangerous ground and are getting ready to give up our greatest and most valuable rights in the canal. If we get on our knees now and admit we are wrong and have no rights in the canal, we will soon find that we have made the greatest blunder in the history of the world. I am not a politician, neither have I any interests in the controversy, but I am an American, a man of family, a taxpayer, and loyal citizen, and as such I protest against such a shameful course to curry favor with any nation.

I am not an advocate of war, neither am I one that would turn my back to an enemy of this country, and I can not help feeling that had Congress and the Senate acted wisely they would have taken the bit in their mouths and passed measures to build not one but at least six first-class battleships each of the preceding several years and appropriated sufficient money to purchase full equipments of field artillery and ammunition so as to put us on a war footing. Army and Navy officers admit we are woefully short on supplies and would have to go war with obsolete guns and insufficient ammunition; certainly a deplorable state of affairs in such a great country as this.

I trust you will pardon me for writing so frankly, but when our own Congressman will not listen to our appeals to safeguard our interests we have no recourse except to look to others who have the proper quality of backbone and patriotism so essential to our honorable bodies in Congress and the Senate if we expect to command proper respect from foreign jingoes and not be put down as a weakling Nation, devoid of the intellect given us by our Creator.

Very respectfully, R. L. TRIMBLE.

1806 Scott Street, Covington, Ky.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Washington if, in his opinion, the President of the United States is actuated by any sinister or improper or unpatriotic motives in the position he has recently assumed upon the canal-tolls question?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not questioning the motives of the President. I think the President is acting honestly and according to what he sincerely believes to be right. I say that in justice to him.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I should like to ask another question, Whether the Senator approves of these reflections upon and charges that are made directly and indirectly against the President, thus assailing his motives as well as the substance of what he seeks to accomplish in the letters the Senator is spreading upon the records of the Senate?

Mr. JONES. I will not say that I especially approve of the language that may be used here; but, as I stated before, these are letters from ordinary citizens of the country, who are very apt to express their views in rather strong language. Furthermore, they do not go further than expressions we often hear on the floor of the Senate, where arguments are presented which can be very easily construed into questioning the motives of those who do not agree with the one who may be addressing the Senate. I am simply presenting these letters as expressions of the thoughts and the feelings and the sentiments of the ordinary, plain citizens of this Republic on this very important question. As I said, I have taken letters that are expressed in the mildest terms that have come to me.

Mr. THOMAS. Just one more question.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I will not yield further just at present.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask one more question?

Mr. JONES. Not just at present.

I have here another letter, as follows:

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME,
Johnson City, Tenn., March 19, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES.

DEAR SIR: You will please pardon me for addressing you, but I was so heartily pleased with your speech against the repeal of the Panama tolls act, or rather in favor of your resolution requesting certain information relative to the protest of foreign powers, that I can not refrain from expressing my heartfelt joy that you are not afraid to stand up manfully for the right. I hope there will be enough with you to defeat the cowardly action contemplated.

I indorse every word of your speech in denunciation of the cowardly action. I am an old veteran of long and honorable service, a patriot and true American.

Respectfully, yours,

(Signed) DAN A. GROSVENOR.

I have here a letter from 520 Brown Street, Philadelphia, Pa.:

520 BROWN STREET,
Philadelphia, March 21, 1914.

Senator JONES,
Senate, Washington D. C.

SIR: Half a dozen members of my mother's family are your constituents; therefore I feel moved to write commending your course in the canal-tolls matter. You are very much in order in your request for information on the personnel of those mysterious powers who are holding a whip over our heads. We not only do not want, but will not permit star-chamber sessions. We—that is, a majority of the voters—elected Woodrow Wilson to preside over the affairs of the Nation for four years. We did not confer on him any extraordinary powers. A year ago the Nation had the respect of the world powers; his insensately stupid "policy" has dragged the United States through the mire and left us to-day not knowing where "we are at." And in grief that so vitally serious a matter should have that appearance, Mr. Wilson's deliberate and vicious disregard of a prominent plank in the platform he declared for causes any statement he makes to be viewed with distrust until in plain words we, the people, who are paying for all this, will much readier trust the press than the President; and my private opinion is either one will bear watching.

"There are hawks abroad." England would fain place the United States on a level with India, Egypt, and South Africa.

It may be we are so feeble we will have to submit, but you have the Nation back of you in the intent to resist; if we have to die, we will die fighting, not as cowards.

Very sincerely, Miss JOSEPHINE SMITH.

Then I have here a letter from Brownsville, Ark.:

BROWNSVILLE, ARK., March 19, 1914.

Hon. JONES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please send me your speech arraigning Wilson's Panama tolls policy and any other literature you have lying around for distribution on the subject. I am an old-time Democrat, Ex. U. V. C., but I and lots of others of my type are not approving the administration's policy. We think the gravity of the situation entitles the public to full confidence if there is any danger floating around on the corners.

Yours, very truly,

THEODORE POTTS,
P. O. Box 466.

I have here another letter from Louisville, Ky., which I will not take the time to read.

I have here a telegram that I received the other day from St. Augustine, Fla., reading as follows:

[Telegram.]

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA., March 19.

Senator JONES, Washington, D. C.:

If any man be found guilty of treason, let him be punished. Do your duty and fear no man.

THE NATIONAL SOCIETY CONSERVATORS OF AMERICAN WOMEN, LYONETTA MURAT DAY, Secretary.

When I got this telegram I did not know what it referred to, so I wrote a letter inquiring what it did refer to; and I received this reply just this morning:

[Telegram.]

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA., March 25, 1914.

Senator JONES, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of recent date, we have to say, gentlemen who reverse themselves to aid the British Government in their demand for a repeal of the Panama free-tolls act commit a breach of faith with the American people and ought to be tried for treason. Lord Robinson told me in 1907 that the Carnegie Peace Endowment Foundation was a deep-laid plot by the House of Lords in England to overthrow the Monroe doctrine and get control of this country.

THE NATIONAL SOCIETY CONSERVATORS OF AMERICA: WOMEN, By LYONETTA MURAT DAY, Secretary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Washington. I should like to have the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved further, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate of the United States the following information:

First. The amount expended by the United States on each river and harbor separately.

Second. The amounts expended in the construction of canals, other than the Panama Canal, separately.

Third. Whether the United States expends any money to carry vessels through any canal other than the Panama Canal; and if so, how much.

Fourth. The total amount expended by the United States upon the Panama Canal, not only in digging the canal but in obtaining the land for the construction of the canal, and all expenses of every kind, together with the interest which the United States pays upon money borrowed in connection with the construction of the canal.

Fifth. The total cost of maintenance of the canal, including the maintenance of the government on the Canal Zone.

Sixth. The cost to the United States of carrying vessels through the canal, in addition to the ordinary cost of maintenance of the canal.

Seventh. The owners, corporation or otherwise, of the vessels engaged in coastwise trade.

Eighth. The owners of the stock of the corporations owning the vessels engaged in coastwise trade.

Ninth. The amount of the subsidy which all of the people of the country would give to these corporations or persons owning the vessels engaged in coastwise trade if the Government paid for them the expenses of taking their ships through the Panama Canal without charging for the same.

Tenth. What, if any, charges are made by the United States for the passage of vessels of other countries into the harbors of the United States or through rivers or canals in the United States.

Eleventh. The relation of the United States and Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada to the canals connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean, and whether vessels owned by the United States are charged for the use of these canals owned by Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada.

Twelfth. Whether the owners of the vessels engaged in coastwise trade to whom it is proposed to give a subsidy by paying the expenses of carrying their vessels through the Panama Canal free have not already been given a monopoly of the coastwise trade.

Thirteenth. What would probably be the loss annually to the people of the entire country from operating the canal if we gave a subsidy to the coastwise vessels by letting them go free.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, during the presentation of a number of letters from correspondents by the Senator from Washington, I inquired whether he approved of or indorsed the sentiments of those letters by asking if he believed that the President's motive and purpose in his recent message concerning the Panama Canal tolls bill in the House was other than patriotic and upright, prompted by the earnest desire to perform his duty as he understood it. The Senator acquits the President of any improper purpose, and concedes that he is actuated by high and lofty sentiments of patriotism. That being so, I can not understand his own motive in reading into the RECORD letters which assail the President, which challenge his judgment, and which almost accuse him of being in league with some foreign nation or nations.

Mr. President, I think it would have been far more appropriate, far more manly, and far more consistent for the Senator to make that charge directly than to make it through the medium of the communications. For my part, although it may be entirely useless, I wish to protest against the reading into the RECORD of Congress of letters which improperly reflect upon the motives, the conduct, and purposes of Federal officials, and especially the President of the United States. I do not think that is right or just or manly; and I can not conceive what purpose is to be subserved, unless it be a reflection upon the President of the United States, which nothing in his action or public expressions justifies.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would apply the rule he has suggested to the debates on this floor, and it probably will not be very long until attention will be called to that rule in connection with the debates here. If the Senator will take the newspaper discussion which was had with reference to this matter, he can hardly find an article where the motives of those favoring the repeal of these tolls are not questioned directly.

I do not read these letters for the purpose of questioning the motives of the President, however I may differ from him as to his judgment as to what is right. I concede that he is acting honestly. I do not believe we will ever have a President to whom that concession can not be made. These letters, however, simply show the sentiment and the feeling and the indignation in the hearts of the people of this country with reference to an action the result of which, they believe, will be humiliating, and which they ought not to be called upon to indorse.

It will be noted, Mr. President, that in several of these letters the writers have expressly stated what they think ought to be done. They have grasped the purpose of the resolution I introduced. They know that the resolution calls for the information upon which the President's message was based. The Senator can not point in that message to a single fact or a single reason sustaining the proposition to reverse the action we deliberately took two years ago. It seems to me that not only the Senate but the people of the country are entitled to be taken into the confidence of the President, as one or two of these letters say, and have the facts, so that if the critical situation does exist that the President intimates in his message we shall be acquainted with it.

I have not any doubt but that if the facts of the situation warrant the fears of the President, Congress will rise above partisanship, will rise to a broad plane of patriotism, and we will do whatever is necessary to preserve and protect the honor of the American people. If to do that requires that we shall reverse our action of two years ago, we will do it. It does seem to me, however, that Congress ought to insist, as the American people have the right to insist, when we are asked to reverse our deliberate action, that there shall be given to us the reason upon which we can base a reversal of that action.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my purpose was neither to defend nor to attack the President, to criticize nor to commend his recent message. When the time comes for me to express myself upon that feature of this question, I shall not hesitate to do so. My purpose was to protest as one of the Members of this body against what seems to me to be a practice that derogates from the dignity of the Senate and reflects upon the Chief Magistrate. I do not think that any Senator who believes in the integrity of the President's motives can justify his action in reading into the RECORD articles and letters from others that impugn his motives and almost charge him with treason.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I infer from the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the resolution introduced by my colleague that he entertains the idea that the American people can reimburse themselves for the great expense in digging the Panama Canal by taxing themselves for it, and that in order to make the canal profitable as a commercial enterprise we should levy a great burden upon all the shipping which goes through it owned by our own people carrying merchandise between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. This strikes me as being quite an astonishing proposition, when all the American people, including those on the Pacific coast, for years have been carrying their share of the burden of river and harbor bills for the improvement of water navigation in this country, when there is a canal built which especially concerns them and which never would have been built except upon the idea that it would cheapen transportation between the Atlantic and the Pacific seaboards—that idea being one of the great motives which enabled this enterprise to be put upon its feet and carried to a successful conclusion—now that it is completed it is proposed that those people who are especially concerned and ought to benefit by it should pay for it again by having a tonnage tax levied upon their commerce that goes through it.

I want to say, Mr. President, that that peculiar idea of paying for this canal, either its construction or its maintenance, will be rejected. It may be adopted by this Congress. I hope it will not be; and if this matter is delayed a little while until the American people can be heard from I do not believe it will be adopted by this Congress. If it is, it will not be allowed to rest there. It will be carried before the people of this country, and I do not believe that it will ever be adopted as a permanent policy. We have already paid our share for its construction.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I asked that the resolution might go over until to-morrow without prejudice, and I supposed that that order had been made until my attention was called to the fact that it was not. I am perfectly willing——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not made. The Senator from Washington was recognized the moment the request was made, and the Chair had no means of knowing whether he intended to make a speech or to object to its going over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to say in this connection that I have myself thousands of letters from nearly every State in the Union, some of them reflecting on the President, some of them reflecting on Members of the Senate, a few criticizing me. I have them on both sides of the question, but most of them are in criticism of the measure to repeal the exemption provision of the Panama Canal act. I have not seen fit to present them here. They came to me so numerously that I have adopted a form letter with which to answer them, when I do answer them at all. I am, however, in accord with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with reference to such matters. I have enough letters and telegrams now to pretty nearly fill a volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I have not seen fit to present them. I should like to have the resolution go over without prejudice until to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That means that it is to be the order again to-morrow and is to be taken up to-morrow morning. I object to its going over without prejudice.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to discuss it now or at any other time with the Senator. I made the suggestion simply at the request of some Senators who have matters pending here; but I say now, I accept the Senator's challenge, and I am willing to discuss it with him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I withdraw my objection. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and others have some matters that they are anxious to take up.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I had that desire on their part in view when I requested that it might go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolution going over without prejudice until to-morrow?

Mr. LODGE. Having been in attendance in a committee, I was not able to get here when the resolution came up. I should like to ask if the pending motion is its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. LODGE. What has become of that motion, made by the Senator from Georgia?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is quite evident that a number of Senators do not understand what resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I confess that I do not know myself, because I have not been able to be here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. This is a different resolution, calling on the Secretary of War for information with reference to money which has been expended on river and harbor improvements. Is there any objection to its going over until to-morrow without prejudice?

Mr. THORNTON. Before the matter is disposed of, I would like to say just a few words.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Is there objection to the resolution going over?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That depends on whether I can find——

Mr. THORNTON. The only reason is that I do not like to speak on a question after it has been disposed of.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not blame the Senator, but——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Louisiana if the resolution is not to go over, but if it is to go over it ought to be determined now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Reserving the right to object, if I may, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Oregon, and then I can tell whether I will object or not. Why does the Senator wish it to go over? I do not want to protest against its going over if there is any reason for it, if something else ought to be considered this morning. If not, I do not want the matter to go over. It has gone over one day already.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that I consented that it might go over largely on the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] who has a measure pending, and at the request of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who has a measure that he wants to bring up. If none of those measures can be taken up, I propose to call up the Army appropriation bill. That is the only reason.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It strikes me another reason why it ought to go over——

Mr. THORNTON. I should like to finish my remarks, and then I will be willing to yield to anyone.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator had taken his seat.

Mr. THORNTON. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not ask anyone to yield. I object to the resolution going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I do not think that certain letters which have been read by the Senator from Washington as a part of his remarks could have gotten into the RECORD in any other way, because on account of the nature of those remarks I am certain an objection would have been made to their being allowed to enter the RECORD. Certainly one letter would have been objected to. I refer now particularly to the letter read by the Senator as a part of his remarks, and in consequence of which no objection could be made to it, in which the President of the United States was spoken of practically as a dog—a bulldog or of a bulldog nature.

I deprecate very much the reading of such letters as that into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I know that no one in this country, no matter how exalted his position is, is above criticism, but I do think that public officials, and particularly the highest public official in this country, when he is being criticized, as it is the right of anyone to criticize him, should at least be criticized in respectful and courteous and not indecent language.

I have criticized the President of the United States on this floor for his judgment on certain questions, and I may do so again. I most certainly will if I wish to, but I have never done it in other than courteous and respectful language, and if I have occasion to do it again, I will never do it except in courteous and respectful language.

As I could not prevent the Senator from Washington from reading that letter into the RECORD, I wish now to express my very great regret that he did so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have the amendment stated. Some of us were not here when it was presented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. We had better have the whole resolution read.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to know something about the amendment. It is not in print. I have the resolution before me.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the resolution and the amendment be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. It ought to go, I think, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES. I should like to know who has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts had the floor.

Mr. JONES. Who has the floor now, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor now.

Mr. JONES. There is no Senator here——

Mr. LODGE. I asked for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a question of yielding. It is a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts desires that the amendment may be read. The Secretary will read the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, can that be read in my time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be read now. The Chair does not know whether that would be the time of the Senator from Washington or not.

Mr. JONES. I understood that I was recognized and that I had the floor. The Senator makes a point of order. I do not know what it is.

Mr. LODGE. The point of order I made was that I asked that the amendment be read.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that that is not a point of order that can take a Senator off the floor.

Mr. LODGE. The point of order is that when the reading of an amendment is called for it should be read.

Mr. JONES. The Senator can not take me off the floor to have it read.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to take the Senator off the floor. I can have it read after he finishes. I made the request before the Senator took the floor, but that is neither here nor there. The Senator took the floor away from me after I made my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator has not taken the floor away from the Senator from Massachusetts. The amendment, if he desires, will be read, and then the Senator from Washington will be recognized.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. Did not the Senator from Massachusetts yield the floor, and did not the Chair state that the Senator from Washington had the floor?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think so. It seems to me that that was the order of proceeding. If the Senator from Washington had the floor I scarcely think the request of the Senator from Massachusetts is in order until he has concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I made the request before the Chair recognized the Senator from Washington.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator took his seat.

Mr. LODGE. I had nothing further to do, except to take my seat and hear it read. I supposed that was the usual practice. Therefore I sat down.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Massachusetts made the request, and the Secretary held up the resolution, implying that it was rather a lengthy document, and the Senator from Massachusetts sat down and yielded the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I did not withdraw the request at all. I did not yield the floor, because my request had been made.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have no personal interest in the matter, but the Chair certainly recognized the Senator from Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is not a matter of any very great importance.

Mr. LODGE. Not the slightest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no reason why the amendment shall not be read now, and the Senator from Washington will be recognized immediately after the conclusion of it. The Senator from Washington, as the Chair stated, will then be recognized.

Mr. JONES. The only point is that I want to direct my remarks to something said by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], and I thought I would get the two close together; that is all.

Mr. LODGE. Then I withdraw my request for the reading of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well. The Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply want to suggest that there is no Senator on the floor for whom I have a higher regard than the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], and I would not do anything here—intentionally, at any rate—that his good judgment would not approve. I thought I said before I read the letter that there was language in it that I did not approve myself, but they were simply expressions from an ordinary, plain American citizen. The language from that source would not have the significance that it would have coming from a Senator on this floor. I did not use the language, and I think the Senate will bear me out in the statement that I have never used that sort of language in debate with reference to a question, no matter how strongly I may differ from anyone else. But in letters we could not get expressions from our people in reference to matters in which they are vitally interested and upon which they are very much aroused if they were couched in what we would on this floor call parliamentary language.

I have not any doubt but that none of the people who wrote these letters intended to say just exactly what was meant by the words used with reference to the President, but they did express it probably in language that would not be parliamentary here. They simply used that language to express their feelings and sentiments. The letters were presented out of a few in the mildest terms that have come to me simply to show the feeling that the American people have over this very important question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think that the time has come to make a suggestion to the Committee on Rules in reference to this matter. It is that our rules, which prohibit one Senator from making disrespectful remarks about another, ought to include the President of the United States as well. He can not defend himself upon this floor, and I insist that there is no excuse for us to put into the RECORD disrespectful language regarding the President of the United States because it is a part of a letter. We can always blue-pencil that portion of a letter which we desire to be read into the RECORD. There is no occasion for us to allow a practice to be followed in the Senate in which any Senator can take advantage of his opportunity in the Senate to speak disrespectfully of the Executive of the United States. I suggest that that matter ought to be taken up by the Committee on Rules, and we ought to have a rule which will prevent the abuses that have crept in within the last few months in the matter of letters of this kind.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to ask unanimous consent to have Senate Document No. 382 printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion pending.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask unanimous consent. Of course it can be done by unanimous consent. It is Document No. 382, Sixty-second Congress, second session, which is a report from the Secretary of the Treasury upon a resolution. I will read the resolution (S. Res. 314) so the Senate may understand just what it is:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate a detailed statement, by States, of the expenditures of the Government for river and harbor improvements, giving the amount spent from the establishment of the Government on each river and each harbor, and the total expended; also the expenditures for the construction of canals and the amount expended on each.

The river and harbor bill is coming over very soon and this document is a detailed statement by States and by projects that was furnished the Senate two years ago. I should like to have it brought down to date so that we may have it when that bill is considered, and it is necessary to have it soon in order that the Secretary of the Treasury may prepare the data for it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if there are to be any additions to the document it can not be printed with the same number. The information will have to be collected, and he can then ask that it be printed as a public document. The Senator can see that it would not do to have two documents of a different character carrying the same number.

Mr. BRISTOW. We can take care of that when we get to it. I simply ask that the data in Document No. 382 be brought down to date, and then I can ask for its printing as a separate document.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that would be the proper way to do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], together with the proposed amendment, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I oppose the reference of the resolution to that committee. It is a little unusual to refer a resolution, which simply asks for information to any committee, and it is a little unusual to refer a resolution of this kind, which calls for information from the War Department only, to the Foreign Relations Committee. That motion can be made only for the purpose of destroying the resolution and nullifying the purpose for which it was introduced.

Mr. President, I want to say that, in order to proceed to the consideration of the calendar and to accommodate some of my friends in the Senate, I was perfectly willing, and am yet willing, to postpone the consideration of this resolution; but it was not because of any diffidence on my part or on the part of the friends of the resolution or any fear to discuss the contents of it now or at any other time. I suppose in discussing the proposition to refer the resolution to a commitee I have the right to discuss any phase of this matter.

I may state briefly, Mr. President, that the purpose of the resolution was perfectly honest and perfectly sincere, and it was introduced with a desire to get information from the department of the Government which can furnish the information sought. It is possible that in hastily dictating the preamble to the resolution, which, however, was couched in perfectly respectful language, that I may have said more than was necessary in order to reach the demanding part of the resolution for information.

Mr. President, I am not going to undertake to discuss the Hay-Pauncefote treaty at length at this time; I may discuss it at greater length later, and probably shall do so; I am not going to undertake to discuss at any length the unwisdom, from an economic standpoint, of the proposed repeal of the free-clause section of the Panama Canal act. I simply want to refer briefly to what is likely to happen if the policy of the distinguished President of the United States is to prevail in this Congress.

Mr. President, I want to say here and now that I have the greatest respect and admiration for the President of the United States; I shall never at any time say a word—I would not if I could, and I could not if I would—disrespectful of him, because I believe him to be a thoroughly patriotic gentleman, and believes in whatever he does that he is doing what, from his viewpoint, is best for the people of the whole country.

Mr. President, it is insisted by some of our friends here in Congress that we are going to reverse the position taken by us in 1912. I do not mean to say our friends in the Senate are making this insistence, of course, because I have not heard any Senator say he was going to change his mind and take a viewpoint which was different from that heretofore taken by him. There have been Representatives in Congress, however, if reports be true, who have said that they were going to change their minds. In taking this course they must be influenced either by the suggestion of the President that the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act was unwise from an economic standpoint or they must change their minds simply because of the statement which the President made in his message that it was necessary to repeal the free-tolls provision of the act in question because of diplomatic contingencies of some nature or kind, and that repeal would assist him in alleviating a situation with some foreign power. What power he refers to is left entirely to conjecture.

There certainly is not any evidence, Mr. President, that could have influenced any of those gentlemen who propose to change their minds; at least, if there is such evidence, it has been withheld from some of us; it has been withheld from me; it may have been given by those in authority who know to those who are determined in the coming discussion of this matter to change their minds, but so far as the Senate is concerned, Mr. President, there is not a scintilla of evidence that would justify any Senator in changing his mind, unless it be simply to yield his opinion, his conscience, and his judgment to the distinguished President of the United States. I admire the man and his intellectual power and force when great Senators can be compelled by his mere fiat to do as he wills and as he directs.

But, Mr. President, what was the purpose of the resolution introduced by me? If the insistence of the President of the United States prevails and we repeal the free-of-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act, it must follow, as the night the day, in order to be consistent, that the Congress of the United States must go back on the record it has made since the adoption of the Constitution, and it must, in retracing its steps with reference to this policy, put burdens and restrictions upon the domestic commerce of the United States, which it has always been the purpose of Congress to remove.

There is not a river nor a harbor in this country that has been improved by liberal appropriations by Congress as to which the insistence has not been made in Congress and out of Congress, before committees and out of committees, that the purpose of the improvement of the particular river and harbor was to remove some burden upon the commerce of the country or else to compel the railroad companies to charge a reasonable rate for transportation.

Not only that, Mr. President, but since the foundation of this Government every canal that has been built by private enterprise whether in New England, in the South, in the Middle States, or in the West, the Government of the United States has from time to time attempted to get control of, so as to remove this very charge of tolls from those canals. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, if they will look over the list of canals that are now being improved and operated by the Government of the United States, they will find that in nine cases out of ten those canals have been built by private enterprise and private initiative, charging tolls, and that they have been bought by the Government for the very purpose of extinguishing those tolls and relieving the freight situation of this country.

It will also be found that where canals which have been built by private enterprise, are now in operation by private capital, and have not been acquired by the Government of the United States, they are in most cases owned and controlled by the railroad companies, which hold them for the purpose of preventing competition which might regulate the rates of such companies; and I call the attention of Senators to a canal, within a stone's throw of the Senate of the United States, paralleling the Potomac River, which was built by private enterprise many years ago, and was subsequently bought and is now owned and controlled by a railroad company that parallels it, and which enables the railroad company to control the freight rate between Cumberland and Washington City and to points that are tributary to those cities. There is not any question about that.

In Delaware, where there is a canal built and operated in the first instance by private capital, and still being operated, it is said, at a loss, if we will look into the situation we will find that that canal has been bought up and is now controlled by railroad companies. Why? Not because the railroad companies make any money out of it, but it is to prevent the acquirement of that canal by the Government of the United States or to prevent the operation of the canal by private enterprise, because private enterprise or governmental operation would act as a regulator and restraint upon railroad transportation in the territory covered thereby.

Mr. President, if Senators will interest themselves in this great question and satisfy their own minds, it will be further ascertained that in those larger canals, which are owned and operated by the Government of the United States and maintained by the United States, without expense to individuals and without the payment of tolls, railroad-owned boats, if you please, operated and controlled by railroad companies, are passing through them without the payment of any tolls. Not only is that true of Government-owned canals, but in some instances in the case of State-owned canals railroad-owned boats and boats owned by corporations and individuals are permitted to pass through without the payment of tolls. I suggest this because I want to call attention to this fact: If the passage of American vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic through the Panama Canal without the payment of tolls is the granting of a subsidy to these particular vessels, no matter by whom they may be owned, then the passing of vessels through the Soo Canal or through the Welland Canal or through any other canal, Mr. President, without the payment of tolls, is the granting of a subsidy to the same character of vessels and the same character of people, and, in some instances, it is worse than a subsidy, and I will show you why.

I think it was disclosed in a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee not long ago that a large part of the traffic on the Great Lakes which went through the Soo Canal was on vessels owned by the railroad companies of this country; in other words, the Government was owning and operating a canal on the Lakes which was being used by lake transportation companies which were owned and controlled by the railroad companies and which were enabling the railroad companies to keep up the rates of freight on their railroads because they controlled both means of transportation. Is that the payment of a subsidy to the railroad companies that own and operate the ships through that canal or through any of the other canals of the country?

Mr. President, Congress, in 1912, in order to prevent the railroad companies from doing in the Panama Canal what they had been and are doing on the Great Lakes, and in order to prevent them from owning lines of steamships plying between New York and San Francisco or Portland, Oreg., as they now ply between points on the one side of the Soo Canal and on the other, incorporated in the act of 1912 a provision which prevented railroad-owned ships or ships in which railroad companies had any stock from going through the canal. That provision made it impossible for vessels owned and operated by the railroad companies to charge rates on freight, in combination with the transcontinental railroads, and thus impose a burden upon the people of this country; in other words, that act was safeguarded and protected so that it would be impossible for ocean-going vessels passing through the Panama Canal to create a condition such as exists on the Great Lakes to-day. It made competition possible and probable.

Mr. President, if we are going to repeal the free-tolls clause, where are we going to stop? We are bound to go further. It follows, as a natural sequence, that if we repeal the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act, we must also repeal that provision of the act which forbids railroad-owned ships from going through the canal.

I say to the Senate, and I say it without fear of successful contradiction, that the insidious influence that is behind this movement for a repeal is the Canadian Pacific Railroad Co., backed by the influence of the other transcontinental railway companies. I do not mean to suggest that the President is animated in the least by such a motive, or is influenced by such considerations, but I say that those are the influences which were here when the Panama Canal act of 1912 was under consideration, opposing, as hard as it was possible for them to oppose, the enactment of the law allowing coastwise vessels to pass through the canal without the payment of tolls. They failed to accomplish their purposes in a fair field and in an open fight. They are now entering the field of foreign diplomacy and intrigue.

If Senators will look over the hearings before the Interoceanic Canals Committee, they will ascertain that those who were insisting that there should be no remission of tolls to coastwise vessels were representatives of the transportation companies which were operating lines across the continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. There is not any question about that.

Mr. Schwerin—I mention his name only because he is quite a noted character around Congress—was here from San Francisco. He represented the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. was under the ownership and control of the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific and other transcontinental railway companies. Mr. Schwerin was maintaining a line of ships on the Pacific coast, operating between San Francisco and Panama, simply for the purpose of keeping out any independent line of steamers between San Francisco and Panama. In other words, if an independent line of steamers undertook to operate between San Francisco and Panama, the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.—Mr. Schwerin's line—simply dropped their rates to a point at which no private company could operate at all. That practice was adopted and maintained for years; and everybody on the Pacific coast knows that it is a fact. Then, the losses which were incurred by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. in operating between San Francisco and Panama were made up by increased transcontinental railroad rates. Line after line attempted to enter the field and operate steamships in competition with the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., but every time they were forced out of business. Up in my portion of the country the people suffered from the same conditions. Whenever we undertook to put on a competing line of steamers between Portland and San Francisco, so as to reduce the freight rates of the railroad companies operating between Portland and Seattle and San Francisco, the railway company that operated ships between San Francisco and Panama put on their ships between Portland and Seattle and San Francisco and put the independent line out of business; and the losses which the railroad-owned ships sustained were made up simply by the increased railroad rates from Portland or Seattle to San Francisco. They could afford to lose, Mr. President. It was not a question of loss with them, or how much was lost, because they could absolutely do the business for nothing between these magnificent seaports and make up the loss by high rates over the railroad lines.

I might call attention to some other distinguished gentlemen who came here. Mr. Schwerin came around to me, as he did to others, and undertook to persuade me that I was making a very great economic mistake in voting for toll exemption. They put it on diplomatic grounds, too. They promised to put an immense line of ships from New York through the Panama Canal to the Orient; they made all kinds of promises; and I think you will find that those promises are now matters of record in the Interoceanic Canals Committee reports. They were going to build, as has been suggested to me by one of the Senators present, the largest and finest steamers in the world to ply between New York and the Orient.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the fact that these men were here opposing the enactment of the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, it is now charged in certain quarters that the transcontinental railroad lobby is here to prevent the repeal of the very act which they were here to prevent the enactment of. I do not know who is making the charge, but I see it in print every now and then, and I think the lobby committee is investigating now the very proposition that there is a transcontinental railroad lobby here undertaking to prevent the repeal of the act which granted exemption from tolls to American shipping, and taking a position which is diametrically opposed to the one which they took two years ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there is such a lobby, I am satisfied the lobby investigating committee would like to have the names of anyone who is here lobbying, because we would like to investigate the matter. We have examined some of the Carnegie Institute people with regard to sending out documents favoring the repeal, but as far as the railroad lobby is concerned, we do not know of any witness here; and if the Senator knows any persons engaged in lobbying, we would like to have their names.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that it was published in glaring headlines and in big type that a certain Mr. De Knight had been lobbying here in the interest of the railroad companies, in order to prevent the repeal of this act.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; we have examined him. We have him before us now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad you have.

Mr. OVERMAN. His lawyer has objected to his answering any questions, and the question is now before us whether we can compel him to answer. He swore, however, that he had nothing to do with any railroad lobby.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The statement was also published that ex-Admiral Bowles had paid this man, De Knight, a thousand dollars and was to pay him more for the purpose of getting through the Panama Canal act with the free-tolls clause in it.

Mr. OVERMAN. No.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was published in the papers, anyhow; and Mr. Bowles came on the stand and gave an entirely different version of the whole transaction.

Mr. OVERMAN. He was on the stand, and so was Mr. De Knight; and they said that was with reference to section 11 of the Panama Canal act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am just suggesting that it is a pretty good idea to investigate the matter. I hope the Senate will investigate it; but I make the prediction to the Senator that if he will investigate it as tirelessly as he can and is capable of doing, and as I know he is willing to do, he will find that there was not a single influence here in 1912 opposing the enactment of an American policy for Americans except the transcontinental railroad companies and the transportation companies themselves.

In other words, nearly every business community in this country—East, West, North, and South, producers and consumers—was here with its representatives and its committees asking that this free-tolls clause be inserted in the Panama Canal act to relieve against exorbitant rates, and it was an influence which was overwhelming. The petitions of these communities were inserted in the RECORD. The National Chambers of Commerce, which is composed of distinguished men all over this country—men who, like Cæsar's wife, are above suspicion of dishonesty or bad motives—was here with its resolutions favoring the enactment of the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act, and nearly every business community in the country sent on its petition for that purpose. The records of the discussion of those days are published.

Mr. President, can it be said that Congress was unadvised, and, as the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] suggested, its Members were tired out and too inattentive to know what was going on here? Is it possible that with all this discussion that went on in 1912 on the Panama Canal act, with all these petitions, with all that the business world here was insisting upon at that Congress, the Members of Congress as well as Senators sat here like a lot of incompetents and did not know what was being done in the Congress of the United States?

Mr. President, we all knew what was being done. The consensus of opinion at that time in the Congress was that there was no violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or any other treaty that we had with Great Britain. The consensus of opinion of the Senate now is that there is no violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The consensus of opinion of the people of this country and of Congress itself is that there is no violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The people showed it in 1912, and uninfluenced by any other power or authority, they would show it again by voting to retain that provision in the law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Contemporaneous construction is usually regarded as very valuable, if the person making it is one of repute and a student distinguished in public affairs. Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE is quoted as saying:

> When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was submitted by the President to the Senate, it so happened that I had charge of it and reported it to the Senate. * * * When I reported that treaty, my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Since I have been quoted, I wish to say that I said that in debate. The Senator from Oregon may possibly recall it. I have not changed my view as to the interpretation of the treaty. I was one of the 11 who voted against making the exemption from tolls. I did so then for what I thought good and sufficient reasons, much larger reasons than giving to certain shipping lines the benefit of a few million dollars. That view I have never seen reason to change. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator now, but later in the debate I shall take occasion to repeat the reasons which led me to vote as I did. The Senator knows I have not changed my position.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am sure the Senator has not. I think the Senator has been consistent. There is only one difference that I might have with the Senator about that. If I had felt that the United States was not included in the phrase "all nations," I would go to war with Great Britain or any other power on the face of the earth to insist upon what I knew was the construction and was intended to be the American construction of that treaty.

The President of the United States at the time the treaty was made, Mr. Roosevelt, says there was no violation of the treaty. I know some of my friends here do not like the man who was President of the United States when the treaty was negotiated; but whether they like him or not, he is a man of his own convictions, and he is not afraid of any power on the face of the earth when it comes to asserting a doctrine that is right and that appeals to the American people. Not only that; if I felt that "all nations" did not include the United States, I never would assent to the partial or any other jurisdiction of Great Britain or any other power on the face of the earth over that magnificent waterway, conceived by American brain, constructed by American brawn, and financed by American money.

Mr. LODGE. Did I understand the Senator to say that ex-President Roosevelt had declared that he was in favor of toll exemption?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That he does not think it is a violation of the treaty. There was a statement reputed to have come from him the other day to that effect.

Mr. LODGE. I thought he stated publicly that he was opposed to toll exemption.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not mean to misquote him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to read exactly what ex-President Roosevelt said. Inasmuch as he made the treaty, his constructions should be of great interest now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not intend to misquote him. I saw the statement I have referred to in the papers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not long, and it is quite to the point. Here it is, in the official report of his speech of acceptance of the presidential nomination, in 1912:

> We have a perfect right to permit our coastwise traffic (with which there can be no competition by the merchant marine of any foreign nation—so that there is no discrimination against any foreign marine) to pass through that canal on any terms we choose, and I personally think that no toll should be charged on such traffic.
> Moreover, in time of war, where all treaties between warring nations save those connected with the management of the war at once lapse, the canal would, of course, be open to the use of our warships and closed to warships of the nation with which we were engaged in hostilities.
> But at all times the canal should be opened on equal terms to the ships of all nations, including our own, engaged in international commerce. That was the understanding of the treaty when it was adopted, and the United States must always, as a matter of honorable obligation and with scrupulous nicety, live up to every understanding which she has entered into with any foreign power.
> There could be no better illustration of the extreme unwisdom of entering into international agreements without paying heed to the question of keeping them.
> On the other hand, we deliberately and with our eyes open, and after ample consideration and discussion, agreed to treat all merchant ships on the same basis. It was partly because of this agreement that there was no question raised by foreign nations as to our digging and fortifying the canal; and having given our word, we must keep it. When the American people make a promise, that promise must and will be kept.

Mr. Roosevelt was the President of the United States at the time this treaty was negotiated. He negotiated it; he was the author of it; and he proclaims with great solemnity that we not only have the right to do it, but that, as a matter of governmental policy, it is wise that it should be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the way I understood, Mr. President; and yet I thought I might possibly be mistaken about it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to supplement what has been said by the Senator from Michigan with regard to the views of ex-President Roosevelt respecting our obligations under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In an article over his own signature in the Outlook of January 18, 1913, he reiterated his view that there was nothing in the treaty that prevented the American Government from extending exemption to its coastwise trade. In that connection he declared that he knew of no interest disputing the right of the American Government in that respect other than that of the transcontinental railroads, and particularly the Canadian transcontinental railroads, through whose influence the British Government was induced to make an objection. At the time the objection was made it was distinctly declared that if the exemption could be restricted to bona fide coastwise trade the British Government would have no objection and could not make any to the terms of the treaty. It did reserve, however, its objection to the right of the American Government to exempt from the payment of tolls American ships engaged in over-seas trade.

When it is remembered that on July 8, 1912, this concession was made, and that largely because of that attitude the Senate receded from the amendment proposed by the Senate committee, extending the exemption to all ships, and adjusted itself to the concession made by the British Government, it is incomprehensible how this agitation has continued up to the present time. There must be influences other than purely international interests that induce the groundless assertion from time to time that we have offended our treaty, when it is a matter of record under date of July 8, 1912, that the British Government conceded that no objection could be urged if the exemption should be confined to bona fide coastwise trade.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senators [Mr. SMITH and Mr. O'GORMAN] have discussed the attitude of the then President as I understood it. As a matter of fact, there ought not to be any question about it, because he ran on a platform which declared just what the Democratic platform did with reference to exemption from tolls, and I do not think the Senate or the people misunderstand his position.

Referring again, however, to the attitude of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], he said here on the floor of the Senate, in discussing this matter in 1912, as the Senator who had reported this treaty to the Senate, that he did not think the words "all nations" embraced the United States, and a reading of this treaty will show that it was not contemplated that the United States was included in it; but I was going to show how I differ from the Senator.

I can appreciate how the Senator feels about it. Notwithstanding that, he is opposed to the granting of exemption from tolls. Notwithstanding the fact that the Senator knows that, in contemplation of the committee and of the Senate, too, the words "all nations" did not include the United States, out of a delicate sense of honor, because somebody may suggest that we are violating the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, he is willing, as are some other Senators here, to surrender our rights in this country and in this canal to the jurisdiction of Great Britain. Mr. President, it is inconceivable to me how any man who loves his country and his kind can consent for a moment to yield to the demands of Great Britain, and that is what this is.

People may talk about "demagogic speeches." I do not care what they charge me with. I will not stand upon the floor of the Senate and advocate and plead the cause of Great Britain as against my own country. Who has pleaded the cause of America in this contest with the country that for 100 years has not been at peace with her, and is recognized by the countries abroad as not the friend of America? We are making ourselves the laughingstock of the Continent, although Great Britain applauds.

Mr. President, if men in other countries than this were guilty of the things that Andrew Carnegie has been guilty of to-day, they would be charged with treason and their estates confiscated by the Government under which they lived. Why, Mr. President, he has sown more trouble in this country than any other one man in it. He is obsessed with the idea that there shall be a United States of Great Britain and the United States. He has been obsessed with that idea for a long time, and he has not hesitated to spend his millions to undertake to create a reciprocal feeling in the minds of all the people of the United States. His tainted money reaches out to the children of our country through the universities and schools. It plies its unworthy vocation in pulpit, press, and platform.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me, in calling attention to the statement of the honored Senator from Massachusetts I did not say that he had changed his mind. I quoted that statement because it was sound and refreshing to read.

Mr. LODGE. I explicitly said that I did not take a different view now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly not. The Senator from Massachusetts agrees that we have the right under our treaty to do just what Congress in its wisdom did do. I am not criticizing the Senator. I am quoting him with approval on the law and the American right to free tolls for our coastwise ships through the canal. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is quoted as saying:

> I shall vote to exempt coastwise vessels from these tolls, because I think we have a right to do it.

I do not suppose he has changed his mind. At least, this is no hasty expression of opinion; there is very great frankness in this statement, which is usual with the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not make this statement for the purpose of inviting controversy, but it is high Democratic authority on the power of the Government under this treaty and corroborates our attitude now. Both sides of the Chamber gave the subject full consideration, and the policy adopted met with quite unanimous approval in Congress and throughout the country. If it was good then, why is it not good now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The quotation made is, as far as I can remember, substantially right. I did say that I would cast my vote that way, because we had a right to do it. I made the mistake that Edmund Burke advised the Parliament of Great Britain not to make—not to tax the American Colonies merely because they had the right to do it; and in explaining his statement he said, "I have a legal right to shear my sheep in the wintertime, but it might not be expedient to do it."

I have not changed my mind as to the legal conclusion that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not prohibit us from exempting from tolls bona fide coastwise trade, and Great Britain, as the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has said, admitted that we had a right to exempt bona fide coastwise trade. I have come to the conclusion that I went off upon a like point and lost adherence to a very much greater and more fundamental Democratic principle; and while I have not changed my opinion to the effect that we had the legal right to do it, I shall very proudly change my vote. It is one of the votes, and one of the few in my public career, of which I am to-day ashamed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is one of the votes, Mr. President, I may say, of which I am proud.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate joint resolution 41.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. REED. My colleague [Mr. STONE] has not been able to return to the Senate on account of sickness. He is, however, I am glad to say, engaged in committee work this morning. I make this announcement of his necessary absence.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the proposed substitute offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] for the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. MYERS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment read or stated, so that we may know what we are to vote on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to be voted upon proposes that all moneys received from the rental of this land shall be turned into the reclamation fund and expended for reclamation purposes, and when returned from the reclamation fund one half shall go to the school fund of the State of Montana and the other half shall go back to the reclamation fund. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I do not see that Senator in the Chamber, and so I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is absent from the city and I withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. He is absent, and on that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Not knowing how he would vote upon this amendment, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber, and that he has a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I therefore transfer it and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN. I announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I again desire to announce the pair between my colleague, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—18.

So Mr. WALSH's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. The question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], I call attention of the Senate to the fact that it makes disposition of only one-half of the rental. I accordingly move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota by adding thereto the following:

And the other one-half shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed amendment a comma and the following words:

And the other one-half shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for a rereading of the entire amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. So that if amended the proviso will read:

Provided, That one-half of the amount received by the Government as rental therefor shall be paid into the treasury of the State of Montana for the benefit of the public schools of that State, and the other one-half shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am solicitous that my vote shall be cast correctly, and I will ask the Senator from Montana upon what hypothesis a portion of the proceeds from the sale or rental of the public land is turned into the State in which the lands are located?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I myself proposed an amendment providing in terms that the whole of it should be turned into the reclamation fund. However, I did not get very much support from the other side of the Chamber upon the amendment which I tendered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator's question, it is why any part of the proceeds of the natural resources of any State should go to the treasury of the State. We have, I think, about one-third of our State tied up in reservations, which the people are not permitted to avail themselves of under any law that has yet been made effective for that purpose, except now and then, when through a bill in Congress we slice off a piece and give it to some special interest; but so far as the settlers and people who desire to build up the State are concerned it is practically taken away. It is removed from the domain of the taxing power for the building up of our schools and public buildings and those things which are essential to the development and upbuilding of the State.

The argument, so far as I am concerned, would be that so long as that continues some portion of the fruits of the natural resources ought to go into the treasury of the State to take the place of that of which the State is unjustly deprived.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there may be something in that argument; and yet, while I have been voting consistently with western Senators in these matters which affect their States, it seems to me that if this amendment is adopted it is a recognition of the principle that their States have some claim beyond that of other States upon the public lands, and that it is the first movement toward turning over the public lands to the States in which they are located. Indeed, I have heard that suggested several times.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator says this is a first movement in that direction. If we have already recognized the principle that a certain proportion of the moneys derived from the forest reserves shall be paid to the States——

Mr. GALLINGER. I recall that fact, Mr. President. I thought when that was done it was a mistaken policy, and I think this is a mistaken policy; but I am not going to say anything about it, further than to call attention to it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. This policy could only be defended, I think, upon the theory announced here yesterday, that it was not changing the general policy with reference to this land. Heretofore the policy has been to dispose of the land in the State, so that it would be taxable and would yield revenue to the State; but it seems that the policy is going to be changed, and as long as the 70 per cent of which the Senator speaks is perpetually reserved, and can not be used even for mineral purposes now, as to the remaining 30 per cent of the property, the people of the State will not be allowed to derive any revenue from its development at all otherwise. The title is to be held in the United States, and therefore it seems to me eminently just that the State should receive a portion of the revenue which is paid in from the development of those lands.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, would it not be much better, as the joint resolution was, I understand, almost if not quite unanimously reported from the committee, that the lands be sold? Then, of course, the money goes into the Treasury of the Government, and the lands would become taxable in the States.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me a moment further?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Almost every foot of the land in question is owned by individuals, but the Government has pursued a policy in the last few years of reserving coal lands and minerals of that character. In this way the homesteader might acquire the surface, but the Government reserves the coal. The surface lands of approximately the entire 2,000 acres are not to be sold at all. It is owned by private individuals, but now it is proposed that the Government shall allow the railroad company to purchase or lease the coal under those lands, the title to which remains in the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no disposition to discuss the question at length. As I have several times said during the past week, I am extremely anxious that the business of the Senate should proceed with as much rapidity as possible. Yet I have been considerably disturbed over the apparent tendency to reach the conclusion that the public lands in some way belong to the States in which they are situated. I do not agree to that proposition; but there is a good deal of force in what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] said the other day very eloquently, and what he has repeated in a few words to-day, that the lands are tied up and that the States in which they are located are denied the privilege of taxing them and in that way get a revenue for the State government.

It occurs to me that in the near future this matter ought to be taken up by the Senators who know most about it—I know comparatively little about it, I am free to confess—and that we should have a more definite method of dealing with these questions.

I think our reclamation projects, Mr. President, are in a rather bad shape. Every New England Senator voted in favor of the irrigation projects, and we were glad to do it, but I confess that I personally am not very well satisfied with the present shape in which they seem to be.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator allow me just a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I wish to state to the Senator that there is now a bill pending, offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], dealing generally with this very proposition of the disposition of coal and like minerals on the public domain, and that measure will undoubtedly receive very serious consideration not only from the Senators directly interested but from the Senate generally, as it will mark a new era, possibly, in the development of our natural resources.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad to know that. It had escaped my attention. For the present I shall content myself with the few words I have uttered on this subject. We want to deal justly with the newer States, the States where the public lands are located. At the same time we want to deal justly with the Government and with the people of the rest of the country. My only anxiety is that a broad view shall be taken of the matter and that our legislation shall tend to reach just and equitable conclusions. That is all I should expect, and that I hope will be accomplished through the bill the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has introduced, and possibly other bills which other Senators who want to do equal and exact justice between all the States of the Union will present to Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, whatever small portion of the proceeds of our natural resources may be or are being turned into the State treasuries is the alternative of what we would like to have, and that is an opportunity under a reasonable law to develop those natural resources by bona fide settlers and people who come into the State and build up the State. We want neither waste or monopoly, but a chance for honest citizens to develop the State, make homes and prosperous communities.

Whenever there shall be provided a general plan or system by which that development shall go on there will be no particular effort on the part of the representatives of the Western States to get anything in the way of recognition that has not been given to States heretofore in their period of development. If we could have reasonable rules and regulations and laws for the development of those resources, these questions would not arise.

But while I am on my feet, Mr. President, and for fear I may have to be away when the vote is taken, I want to say that I am opposed to this measure. I think in all probability the measure itself, so far as the particular facts which relate to the individual measure is concerned, would justify the passage of the joint resolution, but it proposes to establish a precedent along a line to which I am unalterably opposed. We have,

as I said a moment ago, practically locked up these natural resources of every kind. Now, instead of formulating some general plan or law or system by which any settler or any individual may go and acquire a portion of these natural resources, we have reserved them all and proceed by a bill now and then to slice off a piece and give it to some particular interest which is strong enough to exercise influence upon Congress, while the ordinary settler, Tom, Dick, and Harry, who may be searching for an opportunity to make a bona fide home or develop a mine, has not sufficient influence to get himself heard and therefore is entirely shut out from access to these natural resources.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is calling attention to a general situation which certainly applies to this case, and not only that, but the report filed by the committee when it reported this joint resolution shows that there are settlers, private citizens, to whom the Senator from Idaho is referring, who are claiming the right to this very land and to this very coal at this time, and trying to get it. The matter is being considered by the General Land Office.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Washington for his suggestion. That condition of affairs will inhere from time to time where the individual settler, the obscure individual will not have sufficient influence to make himself felt and to present his case to Congress. He will be ignored or shut out entirely, while some powerful corporation present their cause, and Congress passes upon it and gives them what they ask. I think that a wrong policy, irrespective of the merits of a particular bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment I will. The result of that, Mr. President, is that those for whom the public lands, the natural resources, ought to be reserved are entirely precluded from availing themselves of these rights, and we hold these resources here to be distributed from time to time, as Congress sees fit. The result of it will be that those will get them who ought not to get them and those will not get them who should get them.

We ought to have a general law, a general system, by which any man complying with the law and acting in good faith under the supervision of the Government may go upon a par and upon the same basis as can every other citizen and acquire his right. Now, I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in regard to the statement of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] as to individuals claiming the coal under some of these lands, the joint resolution specifically provides that nothing in it shall interfere with any vested or inchoate right of any individual claimant.

As to the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that powerful interests sometimes get recognition from Congress where individuals do not, I wish to say that it is a common practice for Congress to enact a private law for the issuance to an individual settler of a patent for a certain tract of land. I now have reported on the calendar of this body a bill to issue a patent to 40 acres of land to a blind man who is a pauper.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to answer the statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] as to the proviso in the joint resolution which purports to protect these individual entrymen on this coal land. I know there is such a proviso in the joint resolution, but it is very doubtful, in my opinion, whether it would protect the rights of those entrymen. The only purpose of the joint resolution is to grant this coal; it carries a specific grant of the coal; and there is attached to the grant a vaguely worded proviso which you say will defeat the grant. Nobody on earth can state what the courts would hold in regard to that. What chance would these poor, unknown settlers have in carrying on litigation with the Milwaukee Railroad to protect their rights under that sort of a condition? This proviso refers to the "surface or other entryman." Well, the only entrymen there are surface entrymen; and the language is drawn so that it would create a presumption that it is intended only to protect their rights to the surface.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Idaho bear with me just a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. The contest would not be between the individual and the railroad. The issue would be between the individuals and the Government of the United States as to who had the prior rights.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Montana is probably correct, so far as the superficiality of the record would be concerned, but, as a matter of cold, hard fact, the contest would be between the railroad company and the settler.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; the railroad company would likely be around there somewhere when it was determined.

But I was not, Mr. President, reflecting upon the integrity of purpose or the bona fides of the particular proposition on hand. I only referred to it because it is the wrong method by which to dispose of these natural resources. There ought to be a universal rule, a law which would apply to everyone alike, and special grants ought not to be favored. It ought not to be necessary for men to come to Congress or for associations to come to Congress in order to get these things. It is a fruitful source of corruption; it is a fruitful sort of favoritism. We ought not therefore to be content to deal it out by piecemeal, but ought to pass a general law by which everyone can deal with the subject matter upon the same basis.

Regardless of the merit of this particular transaction, I am opposed to the proposition for that reason. Let us set about and provide a general plan available to all alike or available to none.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel that a more direct answer is due from me to the very courteous question addressed to me by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I think the very just right of the States to a portion of the returns from property of this character when we shall enter upon a leasing system, if we shall enter upon that system, has been very clearly stated by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In that sentiment I very heartily concur.

My idea was that the just disposition would be to apply the proceeds, first, to the reclamation fund, and then, when it was returned by the settler, to make the division. When the general bill is under consideration I shall urge that disposition of the funds rather than an immediate division between the State and the National Governments of the rentals, and for this reason: Of course, if the present policy of the disposition of the fees is persevered in, all of the purchase price will under existing law go to the reclamation fund. If now we shall depart from that policy and adopt the leasing policy, the effect would be to very materially reduce the funds accumulating from year to year for the benefit of the reclamation fund; but that the State from which the revenues are thus derived from the rental of this property, and which is denied the opportunity to tax the property, has a just claim upon such rentals, I think everybody on consideration will fairly admit.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I trust that I shall not offend any other Senator when I say that, in my opinion, there are no Senators in this body who are better lawyers than are the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I might add others to the list. They are all representatives of western States; they have this matter carefully in mind; they have studied it undoubtedly to a great extent; and I will venture to add to what I have said that it seems to me that those Senators ought to get together, calling to their aid all the information that is available, and present a comprehensive bill that would free the Senate from the discussion of the questions that are constantly arising here regarding the disposition of a few acres of land to some corporation or to some individual, and frame a law that would meet every emergency that could possibly arise.

Mr. President, I make that suggestion for what it is worth. When such a bill as that is presented, whether it fully agrees with my views or not as an eastern man, I shall certainly be glad to support it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe that the changes which have been made in the joint resolution have greatly improved it. It is perfectly plain that the Senate is not at this time ready to say that a large tract of land shall be sold to anyone. While I am perfectly willing to trust to the Secretary of the Interior, especially the present Secretary, to determine whether or not these lands shall be sold or leased, I believe that I shall offer a substitute for the joint resolution as amended relieving the Secretary from any further responsibility than a straight leasing proposition.

Mr. President, I am not a lawyer, but I believe that we should guard the interests of the entryman. Entrymen who have taken this land, either under the timber and stone act or the homestead act, should be protected. Whatever their rights may be, whether they have a vested right or an inchoate right, Congress should not attempt to take any of those rights away from them.

I realize, Mr. President, that Congress can not by legislation take away a vested right, but Congress can put these men, who as a general rule are poor men, to a great deal of expense. In the substitute which I propose to offer there is a proviso, to which I call the attention of Senators, which reads as follows:

Provided further, That said lease shall be made subject to the legal or equitable rights, inchoate or vested, acquired by any entryman on any part of said lands, including coal or other minerals, prior to the execution of said lease.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. Is not almost that identical language, or language to the same effect and meaning, in the joint resolution as it now is?

Mr. GRONNA. I am afraid not; it simply refers to the surface of the land.

Mr. MYERS. Surface and all other rights. Let me read it to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. "Surface or other entryman" is the language of the joint resolution, I believe.

Mr. MYERS. Let me read it, if the Senator will pardon me a moment:

Provided, however, That said sale shall be made subject to the legal or equitable rights, inchoate or vested, of any surface or other entryman on any part of said lands.

So that it covers the surface entry or any other entry.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Are there any other entrymen except those who have entered the surface?

Mr. MYERS. My opinion is that there are some who are claiming the coal, and they would come under the term "other entrymen." We want to protect everybody.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I understand that they would be classed as surface entrymen; that they simply claim the right to the coal under an entry made to the surface.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; the Senator is correct about that. As I recollect, the question of law is now pending before the Interior Department whether an ordinary entryman to land gets the mineral underneath it or whether the Government has the right to retain the mineral. That is a question of law which is before the Interior Department yet to be decided, and I do not think this joint resolution should have anything to do with it.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President, I am quite sure that the Senator from Montana is just as anxious as I am to protect the interests of the entrymen, whatever they may be, and for that reason I can see no harm in making the language of the joint resolution so plain that it can not be misunderstood.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, I ask is the Senator now offering a substitute merely for the provision in regard to surface and other entries such as he has read, or is he offering a substitute for the entire measure?

Mr. GRONNA. I propose to offer a substitute for the entire measure. I assume, Mr. President, that these lands will be leased. According to the vote taken by the Senate, it is clear to me, although I may be mistaken, that it is the wish of the Senate that the Secretary of the Interior shall lease these lands, and not sell them.

While I am on that subject, I want to say that the Geological Survey has made an estimate that these lands contain at least 10,000,000 tons of good semibituminous coal. If the Government of the United States charges a royalty of 5 cents a ton, that would amount to $500,000. The minimum appraisal made of this land is $20 per acre and the maximum is $62 per acre, making an average of $41 per acre.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish that there may be no misunderstanding about this matter. Although much has been said about selling the lands at their appraised value, the joint resolution provides that the lands shall not be sold at less than the appraised value. The Secretary of the Interior can make the price a million dollars an acre if he wants to do so.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true, Mr. President; but I am simply reciting the facts as set forth in the report made by the Secretary of the Interior. The average value would be $41 per acre. Two thousand acres at $41 would amount to $82,000. Therefore, the sale would involve a loss of more than $400,000, one-half of which, if it were not lost, would go to the State of Montana for the purpose of building up the public schools of that State. I do not believe that any man should oppose a proposition to charge a corporation for the privilege of mining coal a royalty of 5 cents per ton. If this coal is worth anything, it is worth 5 cents per ton; and we have no right, I say, to give to this corporation or to any other corporation a tract of land that contains 10,000,000 tons of coal or more at a price less than 5 cents per ton.

Mr. President, I know the Senate is anxious to take a vote, and I do not wish further to delay the proceedings. I therefore offer as a substitute for the joint resolution the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to lease to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of and doing business in the State of Montana, the coal deposits in and under the following-described lands situate in Musselshell County, State of Montana, to wit: Section 30, township 8 north, range 26 east; section 6, township 7 north, range 26 east; northeast quarter of southeast quarter and southeast quarter of northeast quarter and west half of southwest quarter, section 26, township 8 north, range 25 east. The terms of the lease shall be such as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, but the period of the lease shall not be more than 20 years, and the Republic Coal Co. shall pay a royalty of not less than 5 cents per ton on all the coal mined under the lease: Provided, That one-half of the amount received by the Government as rental or royalty shall be paid into the treasury of the State of Montana for the benefit of the public schools of that State: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may reserve authority to cancel the lease for failure to operate or mine: Provided further, That said lease shall be made subject to the legal or equitable rights, inchoate or vested, acquired by any entryman on any part of said lands including coal or other minerals prior to the execution of said lease.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I overlooked including the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that the other half shall go to the reclamation fund. I wish that to be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator modifies his amendment. The proposed modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "public schools of the State" it is proposed to insert:

And the other one-half shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the proviso in the substitute, which is intended to protect the individual entryman. I want to protect him in every way possible, just as much as does the Senator from North Dakota; but, with all due respect and deference to the Senator from North Dakota, I will say that I do hope that that substitute will not be adopted, because I believe that it would utterly kill the entire measure. I do not believe it would ever become a law in that shape. I believe that it is a great deal better to leave it optional with the Secretary of the Interior, as it is now. I have no objection to the Senator's first amendment, allowing the land to be sold or leased, but I believe it is a great deal better and fairer to leave it as it is, optional with the Secretary of the Interior, so that he may sell or lease the land as may seem best. I think we can trust his judgment and honesty in that matter.

The Secretary of the Interior has expressed a willingness to assume that responsibility, because he reported in favor of the measure in its original shape, which expressly provided that the land could be sold or leased; and I do hope that if any of the Senators have any belief in the good faith or the merits of this measure they will vote against the substitute, because I believe it would kill the joint resolution.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. GRONNA. It may be that I am mistaken, but I understood the Senator to say that he had no objection to striking out the word "sell."

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; I have not so expressed myself to the Senate. I had a talk with the Senator this forenoon, or just after 12 o'clock, about the matter, and I said that I had no objection whatever to making it optional to sell or to lease, and I am perfectly willing, and glad really, that the Senator has proposed that amendment; but I told him, or intended to tell him, that I thought the proposed substitute would kill the measure, and that I was opposed to the substitute.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I can not see why the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota would have the effect of defeating the measure. It seems to me that, so far as the grantee is concerned——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will tell the Senator a reason, if he will permit me for just a moment. There is an element in Congress that is very violently opposed to leasing the public domain. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] is one so opposed, and some of those who were willing to support the joint resolution in the form which provided for the sale of the land have already been driven away from its support by its being made optional to sell or to lease. If you strike out selling altogether, it will drive more away, and it will meet violent opposition, not only in this body but in the other House.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There are many, Mr. President, who will be driven away from it if it authorizes a sale.

Mr. MYERS. Well, Mr. President, it is left optional. The joint resolution in its present form allows the Secretary of the Interior to do what he deems best.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Milwaukee Railroad Co., if it is in the dire need for this coal that the Senator from Montana describes, undoubtedly would be glad of the opportunity to lease.

Mr. MYERS. Yes, Mr. President; if the joint resolution could ever get through Congress in that shape.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Owl Creek Coal Co., which the Senator's colleague stated on yesterday was a criminal trespasser on certain coal lands and had been successfully prosecuted for fraudulent entry of them, was made the beneficiary of the joint resolution, to which I called attention on yesterday, which provided that the Secretary of the Interior might allow them to continue the operation of the mines upon the lands which they had fraudulently acquired until otherwise provided by law. That expressly reserved the right of Congress to forfeit any claim, either to possession or otherwise, which the Owl Creek Co. had to that land; and yet they were willing to accept a lease from the Secretary of the Interior, and I believe—in fact, I know—that up to the present time they are operating the coal mines upon that land under a lease, and, notwithstanding the reservation in the joint resolution of the right of Congress to make a different law with reference to that land, the Secretary of the Interior gave them a lease for 10 years, a definite period, with the proviso that it might be renewed for periods of 5 years until the renewal amounted to 30 years.

The substitute which is proposed here by the Senator from North Dakota specifies as a minimum the remarkably small royalty of 5 cents a ton. I have heard it argued in a great many quarters that you never could open up the coal mines in this country if they were only allowed to be entered under a royalty system. Yet in the case of the Owl Creek Coal Co. the initial payment required of that company by the Secretary of the Interior was 6½ cents a ton for the first five years and 8 cents a ton for the second five years, with the right on the part of the Secretary of the Interior to increase the royalty for the remaining periods of five years if any remaining periods should be established. If the same rates were applied to the coal described by the pending joint resolution, it would amount in the first instance to $650,000 which the Government would receive for this coal, or if it were applied at the rate of 8 cents a ton, $800,000.

I desire to read an extract from the lease of the United States to the Owl Creek Coal Co. as illustrating what can be done under such a system as is proposed in the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota:

> The said lessee does covenant and agree with the lessor that it will pay at the beginning of this lease, and upon the first day of July of each year thereafter, the sum of $2,480, the same to be credited upon the royalties due under this lease for coal mined during the year ending on the 30th day of June following, or in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior upon any royalties due for succeeding years; and that it will pay on the production of all coal mined under this lease a royalty on each ton of 2,000 pounds run-of-mine, as follows: 6½ cents per ton for the first five years and 8 cents per ton for the second five years, the royalty thereafter to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior at the beginning of each five-year period, as hereinbefore provided, and the payment of royalties hereunder to be made as follows: On all coal mined during the three months next preceding December 31 the payment shall be made on or before February 1 following; on all coal mined during the three months next preceding March 31 the payment shall be made on or before May 1 following; and on all coal mined during the six months next preceding September 30 the payment shall be made on or before November 1 following; such payments to be made in such manner and form as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

I venture to say that this coal, assuming that there is somewhere near the amount of it described by the Geological Survey and somewhere near the quality described by that authority, will be worth net to the Milwaukee Railroad Co. $3 per ton. I venture to say that it will be worth on board cars at the mines $5 a ton, and that it can be mined for $2 a ton, which would leave a profit to the Republic Coal Co., or to the Milwaukee Railroad, which owns the Republic Coal Co., of $3 a ton, which would amount to $30,000,000 if the Geological Survey estimate is correct. That is what is proposed, unless the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is adopted, at least to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell at an appraised value of $41 an acre.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington, if he knows, or, if not, the Senator from Montana, the size of the vein in which this coal runs and the estimated number of tons to the acre. I do not know whether the Senator from Washington is informed on that subject.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not informed as to those specific features, although there are some details contained in the committee report as to the character of these lands which I am not able to cite at this moment.

Mr. OLIVER. That information would have a very important bearing upon the value of the coal in the ground and upon the amount of royalty that could be charged. If it is a narrow vein, of course it would cost a great deal more to extract it than it would if it were a thick vein and if it were easily mined.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the railroad companies are at present mining coal on land adjacent to the lands that are proposed to be leased.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. They know exactly what the conditions are as to the size of the veins on which they are now working, and it is estimated by the Geological Survey that those same veins, of the same size, will continue in the land in which the company expects to mine hereafter.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; but I just wondered whether anybody could give the Senate some information as to the size of the vein and as to how many tons of coal per acre can be obtained from this land.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am unable to give the information. I wish I were able to give it, but I am not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. My attention was attracted by an observation of the Senator from Washington to the effect, if I understood him correctly, that if we should pass the joint resolution in its original form it would give to a railroad corporation $30,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was substantially what I said.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator upon what authority that estimate has been made or submitted?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is made upon the authority of the report of the Geological Survey, which is incorporated in the report of the Department of the Interior, and in turn incorporated in the report of the Senate committee upon this joint resolution, that there are 10,000,000 tons of an excellent quality of coal in these lands, and upon the further estimate that that coal will be worth net to its possessors $3 per ton.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the proposition is a very startling one, and it illustrates very clearly how we may be led into voting for an innocent-appearing measure that really contains dangerous provisions. I read this joint resolution half a dozen times, and on its face it did not startle me at all; but it does startle me to learn from the statement of the Senator that if we should pass the joint resolution there is danger of our giving a gratuity of about $30,000,000 to a railroad corporation. I certainly would never vote for a resolution of that kind if that fact is substantial in its nature.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think it can be denied.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. There can be no gratuity about it. If in 'ts final form the resolution authorizes a sale of the land, the Secretary of the Interior can put a price of $30,000,000 on it if he wants to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the joint resolution passes as it is now pending it will authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell this land to the railroad company for $20 an acre.

Mr. MYERS. It says that he may do it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is what I say; it will authorize him to do it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I dare say the Senator from Washington hardly desires to have that statement stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I say, I assume the Senator from Washington will not desire to have that statement stand, at least.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not desire to have it stand?

Mr. WALSH. No; because the joint resolution provides that it shall be sold at not less than the appraised value, and the Senator told us a little while ago that the appraised value was an average of $41 per acre.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The minimum appraised value is $20 an acre, and upon the basis of 2,000 acres it would amount to $40,000.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator averaged the price for us a while ago. His figures do not conform to mine at all. Mine show that the lowest appraisal of any 40-acre tract is $40 per acre. Of course, I simply do not desire the statement to go uncontradicted that there would be any possibility of selling it for $20 an acre. Furthermore, I scarcely think, upon reflection, the Senator will desire his $30,000,000 estimate to stand, either.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, why should I not desire it to stand? The Senator is at liberty to express his views in regard to it. I do desire it to stand.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have no views at all to express about the matter; but while it is possible it is not at all unlikely that the coal when extracted from the earth will be worth $3 a ton and will sell for that, I apprehend that even 10 cents a ton would be regarded as a very high royalty to be paid the Government for its interest in the coal in the earth. Indeed, the Senator from North Dakota felt that perhaps 5 cents a ton would be enough to pay. If, then, there are 10,000,000 tons of it, we must figure its value on the basis of 5 or 10 cents a ton, instead of $3 a ton.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Montana can figure it in that way, and it can be figured in a great many different ways. I gave the process by which I arrived at the conclusion which I stated. I made the statement only as an approximation. There are 10,000,000 tons of coal there, and I estimate roughly that coal of this character is worth somewhere near $5 a ton in that vicinity, mined and on board the cars, and that it can be mined and put on board the cars for $2 a ton, which would leave a profit of $3 a ton, or $30,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. If that is the case——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. If that is the case, I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he ought to increase that royalty to about $2 a ton.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know anything about coal-mining conditions in Montana or in the West, but I do know that the coal operators in the coal fields of western Pennsylvania are extremely well satisfied if they can get a net profit on operations of 25 cents a ton. One of the largest companies in that district in its report for last year, which was rather a favorable year, mined something over 20,000,000 tons of coal, and showed a net profit of only about 12 cents a ton. I am rather doubtful as to the feasibility of any coal operator going out into Montana and opening up a large tract and getting a profit of $3 a ton out of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I will revert in a moment to that phase of this question. I wish to speak of a matter of which the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania reminds me, namely, the uncertainty of the reports upon which such estimates are based——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator, if he will pardon me. And the ease with which any desired showing as to profits can be made by operators. It is pertinent in this case because the illustration that I want to use refers to the Milwaukee Railroad itself, which is the real beneficiary of this joint resolution. I wish to call attention to some caustic criticisms of the methods of accounting and reporting of the Milwaukee Railroad, made by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the report of February 9 of this year. It will have some bearing upon the nature of the information which the Senator from Montana, if he relies upon information which he gets from the Milwaukee Railroad, has to guide him in the various statements which he has made in connection with this joint resolution, such as, for instance, that the Milwaukee Railroad is not engaged in selling coal, when it already appears from the record that the Republic Coal Co. is engaged in selling coal, and that it is a subsidiary company of the Milwaukee Railroad.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield for a question.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator claim that the Republic Coal Co. sells any part of its output to any other purchaser than the Milwaukee Railroad?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I said that it appeared from the record that it did, and the record is the statement of the Senator from Montana himself, here on yesterday.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator state that I claimed that the Republic Coal Co. is selling to other purchasers than the Milwaukee Railroad?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The question was asked of the Senator from Montana if it was not; I think the question was asked by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]; and the Senator from Montana conceded that it was.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to have my answer read to me. I certainly did not intend to make any such answer.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will revert to it in a moment here. The Senator undoubtedly can find it in the RECORD. I have not it in my hand.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to address the question to either the Senator from Washington or the Senator from North Dakota. Has the Geological Survey appraised this land?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; it has been appraised at not less than $20 an acre and not more than $62 an acre.

Mr. NELSON. Twenty dollars an acre is the minimum price fixed by statute for land that is more than 15 miles from a railroad.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I call the attention of the Senator to section 2347 of the Revised Statutes:

> Upon payment to the receiver of not less than $10 per acre for such lands where the same shall be situated more than 15 miles from any completed railroad, and not less than $20 per acre for such lands as shall be within 15 miles of such road.

That is the statutory price. Now, as I understand, for some years—I do not know for how many—it has been the practice of the Land Office to do as they have done in the case of stone and timber entries to appraise the coal lands, and I have known of instances where they have appraised some lands as high as $200, and I think in some instances $400 an acre. I take it that the Geological Survey has examined and appraised this land.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Land Office has classified it and has put upon it a valuation which I will read to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, before he answers, to add a further statement: I will say that it was supposed until recently that these coal lands were to be sold according to the statutory price—$10 an acre for lands that were more than 15 miles from a railroad and $20 an acre for lands that were within that limit. The statute reads "not less than" those prices. Under that statute the department, of their own motion, without any statutory direction, have abandoned the practice that existed heretofore and have held that they had a right to appraise the land and sell it at whatever the appraised value might be. The Geological Survey, I believe, makes the appraisement. What I inquire is, Has the Geological Survey appraised this land?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will read the Senator the statement contained on page 3 of the committee's report, being a letter from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior. It says:

> July 23, 1908, the tracts in section 26, township 8 north, range 25 east, were classified as coal lands.

That is a description of the lands. I infer that was done by the Geological Survey.

> And on May 8, 1909, the other lands described were classified as coal land. In both instances at time of classification prices were fixed and the lands restored to coal-land entry. The tracts in section 26 were reclassified May 8, 1909, and section 6, township 7 north, range 26 east, was reclassified September 15, 1910. The present classified prices of these lands range from $20 to $62 per acre.

Mr. President, I will now call the attention of the Senator from Montana to a colloquy which is found in the CONGRES-

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the constituent company which is supposed to take over this leasing privilege incorporated under the laws of Montana?

Mr. MYERS. It is, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For what purpose?

Mr. MYERS. For the purpose of mining coal, as I understand. I never have seen the articles of incorporation, but that is my information from reliable sources.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mining it and vending it?

Mr. MYERS. I could not say as to the exact words. I assume that it is operating in accordance with its charter, and it is mining and selling coal.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I say a word there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, the Republic Coal Co. is engaged in mining and selling coal; but it sells its entire output, and always has sold its entire output, exclusively and entirely to one purchaser, the Milwaukee Railroad.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has the Senator been informed to that effect?

Mr. MYERS. I have made minute inquiry on the subject not only from the officials of the Republic Coal Co. and the officials of the Milwaukee Railroad Co. but from other coal dealers in Lewiston, Billings, and other towns in the same community; and they all tell me that the Republic Coal Co. never has sold any coal to any purchaser except the Milwaukee Railroad.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether the Milwaukee Road has the right and privilege of selling coal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MYERS. I have nothing to yield. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to inquire whether the Milwaukee road has any right to sell coal?

Mr. MYERS. It has not under the Hepburn Act. It is expressly prohibited by law from doing so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It evades the Hepburn Act, however, by the incorporation of the Republic Coal Co.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask how it evades the Hepburn Act. Does that statement imply that the Republic Coal Co. or the Milwaukee Railroad Co. is selling to the public generally or to other purchasers?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It implies that it owns coal mines and operates coal mines and the road is transporting coal, and my recollection is that that is a violation of the Hepburn Act. The commodity clause of the Hepburn Act prohibited transportation companies from owning commodities which they transported.

Mr. MYERS. My understanding is that it prohibited that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And they come within the law, and yet they violate the law by incorporating a subsidiary company.

To return from that phase of the question to the matter I spoke of with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], I wish to call attention to the kind of showing this railroad company makes for the purpose of gaining its objects of any kind in its business. In the report of which I have already spoken the Interstate Commerce Commission says:

In 1905 the St. Paul Co. commenced the construction of a line to the Pacific coast, extending from a point in South Dakota on the Missouri River to Seattle, a distance of 1,400 miles. It intersects the Northern Pacific at a number of points and traverses much of the territory occupied by that line. By availing itself of the services of the Northern Pacific for the transportation of materials, the St. Paul Co. was therefore enabled to carry on the construction of the new line from several different points at the same time, thus greatly facilitating and expediting the work.

I will say in passing that that is quite enlightening, in view of the effort that has been made by certain parties—and there seem to be a great number of parties outside of this body that are interested in the passage of this joint resolution—to make it appear that this is a life-and-death struggle between the Northern Pacific Railroad and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad. The showing of the Interstate Commerce Commission is that the Northern Pacific Railroad gave every facility within its power to aid the Milwaukee Railroad in this extension. I do not know how that may be. I only cite the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Passing on——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. That is a very interesting contribution to this discussion. I desire to say that there is no life-and-death struggle between these two roads. Happily, they are both doing very handsomely, thanks to the enormously increased production of the State of the Senator and my own State, affording additional traffic for both roads. What I rose to say, however, was that the Milwaukee Railroad is now engaged in the work of electrifying 400 miles of its main line through my State, and within two years it will be operating that stretch of track through electrical energy. It is the first ambitious effort in the electrification of steam railroads in this country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is also very interesting, Mr. President, and I think very desirable. I understand that the electrification which the Senator refers to is owned by the same interests which own the Amalgamated Copper Co.—the Standard Oil interests—who are the principal owners of the Milwaukee road. But that does not bear upon the question which I refer to. The Senator corroborates the view which I expressed as to the absence of any bitter hostility toward the Milwaukee road by the Northern Pacific which would prevent the Milwaukee road from acquiring coal from the lands owned by the Northern Pacific adjoining the land described in the joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH. I interrupt the Senator simply to dissipate any idea that might obtain that there was any such trouble prevailing.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will say that the remark I made was not lightly made at all. A Senator who is interested in the bill described to me no later than yesterday that a great reason which appealed to him was the fight between the Northern Pacific and the Milwaukee. I am glad to hear the Senator from Montana say that such is not the case.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I say a word here? I wish to disclaim that there is any life-and-death struggle between the Northern Pacific and the Milwaukee over this proposition or that there is any bitter hostility, so far as I know. I simply state what I have been told on undoubted authority, that the Northern Pacific Railroad, which owns coal lands in this vicinity, refuses to sell any of its coal or coal lands to the Milwaukee Railroad.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is not in harmony with the relations of the two roads as disclosed by the records which I have read.

But, proceeding to the cost of coal and the profits on coal, the showing made by this company, and the statements made by the Milwaukee road in connection with this measure, the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has authority to require an accounting from railroads, relates here the methods of accounting of this railroad, the means which it uses to make a showing of a lower income and a greater valuation of property for the purpose of influencing the rates which it charges in its business.

By means of these entries the income of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. for the year 1910 was overstated by more than $5,000,000.

As the result of this overstatement of income for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, the report of the St. Paul Co. for the succeeding year showed an apparent falling off in revenue and income as compared with the previous year of over $2,000,000. In its report to its stockholders for the latter year the explanation offered by the officers of the company was that "the large decrease in the net operating revenue is accounted for by the inability to obtain increased rates and the great increase in the cost of labor."

This statement was not in accordance with the facts in the case. Had the income for the year 1910 been properly reported, the net income for the following year instead of showing a decrease would have shown an increase of about $2,800,000 over the net income for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910. The reference to "the great increase in the cost of labor" was no less at variance with the real facts. In its report to this commission for the year ending June 30, 1910, the St. Paul Co., under the heading "Employees and salaries," shows the following tables.

I ask that this table may be incorporated in the RECORD in connection with my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Number of employees June 30, 1910, excluding general officers	56,658
Total yearly compensation	$30,998,418.73
Average daily compensation	$2.23

The report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, gives the corresponding statistics for that year, as follows:

Number of employees June 30, 1911, excluding general officers	48,083
Total yearly compensation	$30,942,724.10
Average daily compensation	$2.27

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then the report continues:

So far, then, from being an increase in the expenditures for labor during the fiscal year 1911, the expenditures on that account were about $50,000 less than in the previous year, according to the company's own reports to the commission.

These departures from what were the actual facts are sufficiently serious to merit the strongest condemnation. The delinquencies in the accounting of the Puget Sound Co. are, however, of even greater significance. The construction of this line was generally regarded as a notable project, and its progress attracted wide attention. The outcome of the enterprise, in respect of the financial returns to the parent company from its operations, was also a matter of both general and special interest, for a showing of profit from its operations could not fail to enhance the credit of the parent company. A large traffic was offered to the Puget Sound line as soon as it was opened, and the evidence before us leads us to think that a correct showing of the operating results for the first year would have been most satisfactory. Not content, however, with a statement of the facts, the income of the Puget Sound was greatly overstated, a variety of expedients having been resorted to for this purpose:

* * * * * * *

Under our rules and regulations this interest should have been charged to income, and this departure from our regulations alone involved nearly $500,000 of error in the report of the Puget Sound Co. for that year.

The unlawful practices just described were continued after June 30, 1910, and the fictitious showing of income for that period was used by the officers of the Puget Sound Co. to aid in the sale of its bonds.

Now, this is the party that is asking this special bounty of Congress. Here is action that, if it is true—and it is reported by one of the best commissions in the Government, the Interstate Commerce Commission—is a felony. I have seen a good many men sent to the penitentiary for long terms of years for making fictitious representations as to facts upon which they obtained money. That is what the Interstate Commerce Commission says this railroad has done.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire of the Senator where he is reading from.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am reading from the bottom of page 513.

Mr. KENYON. That is the recent decision?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The recent decision of February 9, 1914.

Mr. KENYON. No. 933.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. On what page is the Senator reading.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am reading from the bottom of page 513 just at this time. I have read from various portions. The last statement I read is from the bottom of page 513. I think I ought to read a little further, as showing the character and methods of this company:

Another violation of proper accounting and of the commission's accounting regulations by the Puget Sound Co. has occurred in its report of property investment. As heretofore explained, the underlying principle of the classification of expenditures for road and equipment is that the entries in those accounts shall be stated in cash values. In its first report to the commission the Puget Sound Co. reported its investment in road and equipment at $236,333,988, and this amount was carried into our official statistics of railways for the year 1910. Our subsequent investigations of the accounts of this carrier show, as it now admits, that the statement was about $100,000,000 in excess of the cash investment of the company at that date.

But the course pursued was in violation of the commission's rules, and to the extent of $100,000,000 falsified the statistical report for that year officially issued by the commission.

* * * * * * *

Since the hearing we have been advised of another matter which may appropriately be mentioned here, namely, that the St. Paul Co., having first established a percentage of depreciation of equipment of 1½ per cent a year, began on January 1, 1913, to set up a charge of only 1 per cent. This means, omitting the item of salvage, that its equipment has an estimated life approximating 100 years, a position that is wholly indefensible as we understand these matters and one which that company will not be able in any event to justify.

So I say, Mr. President, upon reports——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just one moment. Upon reports as to the prices and profits, whether railroad values or on coal mines, it is a very dangerous thing for such a body as Congress to rely upon the valuation fixed upon property by the interested parties seeking to obtain it. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he has placed in his remarks a portion of the decision which is found at the bottom of page 511 and the top of page 512, which is an exceedingly interesting proposition?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did incorporate that in my remarks.

Mr. President, I wish to substantiate the statement which has been questioned so vigorously by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]; of course, as I said, it can be figured in a great many different ways, and I am not speaking of royalties, but I am speaking of the value of this property, at least, the potential value to this grantee. I wish to show that coal can be mined for $2 a ton. As to what the value of the coal is, the Senator from Montana can estimate for himself. There is no exact value which can be put upon it. It varies from time to time, but it is the general knowledge of everyone in that part of the country that it is worth $5 a ton.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the senior Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. On the point of the $20,0000,000 proposition, as to the value of this coal, I wish to read three lines from a statement by Mr. Edward W. Parker, the statistician of the United States Geological Survey.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not hear his name.

Mr. MYERS. Edward W. Parker, the statistician of the Geological Survey.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does he know the value of the coal?

Mr. MYERS. I am going to read what he says. I suppose he knows what he says:

The average value per ton of all the bituminous coal produced in the United States was $1.07, the costs averaged a fraction of a cent over $1, so that the margin of profit to cover interest, depreciation, and amortization was a little less than 7 cents a ton.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I take the view that the Senator from Montana is a better judge than that statistician of some phases of the price of coal. What does the Senator pay for coal in Hamilton, Mont.?

Mr. MYERS. I can not speak positively, but it retails there, according to my recollection, at something like five or six dollars a ton.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose it is worth that, then, is it not?

Mr. MYERS. It is worth it to the people who have to buy it, I suppose; but I am stating the average.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is worth what you can get for it.

Now, the Government not only leases coal land and has an actual leasing system in effect and is collecting royalties much greater than that proposed in the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, being 6½ and 8 cents per ton, but the Government is also operating a coal mine itself, and operating it most successfully.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. So that no misapprehension may arise about this matter, I desire to say that the nearest coal mine supplying the home of my colleague with coal is something like 300 miles away, and you must add that transportation. We are considerably closer; we are about 225 miles away from the coal mine, and it costs us $1.70 for transportation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator what the price of bituminous coal in Helena is?

Mr. WALSH. My recollection is that it is $5.75 a ton.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, Mr. President, as showing the value of this coal, if it is properly mined, it is a very good light on the question to refer to the Government's own experience, and it is interesting and pertinent here also, because this discussion has gone beyond the specific property described in the joint resolution and has involved the general policy of the Government with reference to its coal lands, and even beyond that—as to the policy of the Government with reference to the entire public domain. I refer to the coal mine operated by the Government Reclamation Service at Williston, N. Dak. The mine is said to be a model of good ventilation and good management, good wages, and reasonable hours to employees; so it can not be said that the Government has been parsimonious in its operation so as to minimize the cost of production. It has been exceedingly liberal. Some statistics gathered by Representative JAMES W. BRYAN, of the State of Washington, are in condensed form, so I will read his statement:

The average output is 100 tons per day. About 12 to 15 miners are employed and paid 60 cents to 80 cents per ton, depending upon location. The average output of a miner is 6 to 10 tons per day. On December 31, 1913, the report showed that 34,365 tons had been mined.

The net average earnings after expense for explosives and supplies is deducted are $3.50 to $5 per day of eight hours. Laborers on track work, hauling, and so forth, are paid $2.75 per day for surface and $3 per day for underground work. Miners are furnished with permissible explosives at a slight advance above cost. A mess is maintained at the mine where meals can be obtained for 25 cents. Sleeping quarters are furnished free. A bathroom with individual lockers gives the men an opportunity of using hot and cold shower baths. During the six years that this mine has been operated no fatal accidents have occurred, and only two or three serious ones. One miner had his leg broken by the fall of coal immediately after a blast. His net earnings were $4.72 per day, and he was paid this amount under the compensation act of May 30, 1908, during the period of disability.

The mine was opened in 1908, and up to 1913 was operated only during the irrigation season of about five months in each year. The average amount of coal mined has been about 5,000 tons per year, and on June 30, 1913, a total of 30,000 tons had been mined at a cost of $1.78 per ton, including all maintenance costs.

So, in my judgment, the approximation which I made of $2 a ton for the cost of mining is quite a liberal one, as shown by the experience of the Government in this same section of the country and under conditions which are somewhat similar.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we are to consider this measure further at all we ought to place it, in the first place, upon a leasing basis exclusively, and the return to the Government ought to be much more considerable than it would be if sold at the appraised value, which would be a trivial sum in comparison with the real value of this property; and the further changes contained in the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] ought to be made, particularly the protection of the rights of these entrymen.

When there are claimants to this land making claim under the general laws, not as special beneficiaries of the Government bounty, but, as the term is used, plain, ordinary citizens claiming this coal, asserting their rights—and we must assume that they are doing diligently what is necessary to be done to protect them—it is a peculiar thing that we should be called on here as the Congress of the United States to grant away this property which they claim a right to. It is a poor makeshift, in my opinion, to attach a proviso pretending to withhold with one hand what we are giving away with the other.

I do not think those men will ever realize the benefits of this coal which they are claiming if this measure passes. Any effort that they might make against the Milwaukee Railroad if it receives the grant contained in the joint resolution would be entirely futile. I do not know of any other case, of any precedent where, when it has been pointed out that there are claimants to the property and that the claims are unadjudicated, Congress would proceed to expressly grant it to another person, especially to a railroad company which must, in the nature of things, have other means of supplying itself with coal. Why not let these men prove up their claims and allow the railroad company to purchase the coal.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a minute.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to answer that question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will allow the Senator. I was going to say that if these men who I assume, as some one said, are poor men, are allowed to prove up on their claims and acquire this property under the general law, then the railroad company would have an opportunity of buying coal from them. Why not take that course?

Mr. NELSON. The Senator misapprehends the law. Under recent legislation entrymen can only enter the surface. The coal is reserved by the Federal Government. These entrymen have only entered the surface, and if they should prove up their claims they would have only the surface right and would have no coal to sell to anybody.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That undoubtedly will be the claim. That is the claim which is made against them now and that is the claim the Milwaukee Railroad will rely upon. But it is not settled that that is the law. The matter comes first before the Interior Department—the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior—and they have reported here that it is unsettled, and that the Government is now adjudicating in that department their claims, not only to the surface, but to the coal. The Assistant Secretary of the Interior Department, in speaking of the quantity of this land, says that if they prevail the amount will be reduced to the extent of the seven timber and stone entries which these men are now asserting the right to.

I do not like the policy. I do not like the looks of a proposition to sell out from under the feet of men who are availing themselves of our land laws property which they have gone to the pains and the expense of acquiring, and granting it away from them to a railroad company.

It is urged, Mr. President, that public lands ought to be opened up, and the state of the law with reference to the disposition of coal lands is attacked because the humble citizens of the country, as they are called, can not acquire and develop the resources of the land on which they live. Here is a case where they are seeking to do that, and are in the process of doing it. This is not a case where the public land would be locked up. Here is where it would be opened up.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator, of course, is fully conversant with the public-land laws of the United States and the method and conditions under which title may be acquired. If this is coal land, can the Senator form any idea how it could be entered under the timber and stone act?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has already been entered under the timber and stone act; the coal had not been reserved from the land; and it is contended by the entrymen that under the timber and stone act they acquired the coal as well as the surface right.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] nods his head in approval. That is true, provided it is not known as coal land. Of course both the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Washington are well aware of the fact that known coal lands can not be entered under the timber and stone act, but under the recent legislation of Congress the surface of land may be entered for agricultural land, notwithstanding coal underlies it. Then the disposition of the coal, I understand, becomes another question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator from Wyoming has stated with substantial accuracy the state of the law on that subject. It is a law that applies not only to coal, but to gold and silver. If a man acquires title to a homestead, he is entitled to gold and silver mines in it if he did not know they were there at the time he entered it. I suppose it is contended by these entrymen that they did not know there was coal under the land at the time they made their entries. That is a question of fact, which I claim ought to be adjudicated before Congress undertakes to step into the midst of the controversy and grant away the property to another party.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire for a few moments to call the attention of Senators to the real situation in this case. If you will turn to the map of the United States, you will find in the northern half of our country, west of the Mississippi River, three great transcontinental railway lines, to wit, the Great Northern on the north, the Northern Pacific in the middle, and the Milwaukee & St. Paul on the south side. The Northern Pacific is the only one that has a subsidy or a land grant from the Government. When the act was passed incorporating that company it gave it an immense land grant. It gave the company all the odd sections within 20 miles on each side of the line of the railroad where it passed through a State at that time and 40 miles within a Territory.

When that grant was passed what is now the State of Montana was a Territory, and the Northern Pacific got every odd section within 40 miles on each side of the line of that road. There was no exception in reference to the coal lands. All the coal lands in that reach of country, from the borders of the State of Minnesota out to the Pacific coast, on the odd sections within the limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific, got within the power of the Northern Pacific Co., and it is only the land outside of the odd sections within that belt that has been opened to exploration and private entry.

The next road that was built was the Great Northern Railway, built on the north side of it. That company had no subsidy, no land grant, but that road was completed before this new method of disposing of coal lands came into vogue, before the adoption of the Hepburn Act, and although they got no land grant like the Northern Pacific they had under the procedure and practice which prevailed then ample opportunity in one way or another to get a supply of coal land.

Now, what is the situation of the Milwaukee & St. Paul road? That has been built within the last four or five years. It has been built without any subsidy, without any help from the Federal Government, and, since the adoption of the Hepburn law, utterly without any power to secure coal for the operation of its road.

I have no interest in these roads. It so happens that these three great systems of road pass through the Twin Cities and pass through my State. We are proud of these roads. They have built up our State. They are equally near and dear to us. The Northern Pacific, under its land grant, have an abundance of coal, and in addition to that, Mr. President, they were not content to take what they have got under their land grant, but to my knowledge years ago, when I was a Member of the House, their officers formed corporations and secured a lot of coal lands outside of their grant.

What is it that the St. Paul road asks here? Under the coal-land law only 160 acres can be entered by one individual or 320 acres by an association, or, if there has been an opening and working of the mine and $5,000 expended in improvements, 640 acres can be entered. Everyone who is at all familiar with coal mining knows that it does not pay to get the machinery and go to work upon a coal mine with only 320 acres or 640 acres.

Now, what is it, I say, that the St. Paul asks here? It asks the privilege of buying the coal on the land at the appraised value. I have figured up the quantity of land. It wishes to buy 1,440 acres of coal land at the appraised price, and the question is whether you will deny that to a great transcontinental line under the policy and practice that has recently been adopted by the Federal Government in relation to the disposal of coal lands. Will you deprive this great company of the petty privilege of securing the coal on 1,440 acres of land? That is all there is in this case. There is no use of magnifying it.

Before the Interior Department adopted this rule—and they have adopted the same rule in the case of stone and timber act entries—it was always supposed that coal lands could be entered at the minimum price prescribed in the statute, just as under the old statute providing for a cash entry at $1.25 an acre, which read just the same. It was always supposed, under that statute—and the Government never enforced any other rule—while private entry was permitted, that those lands could be entered for $1.25 per acre; but still the language was exactly the same as in the case of the stone and timber entries and in the case of coal lands, but in recent years the General Land Office held, as they did in the case of the stone and timber claims, where in respect to coal lands the statute said the price should be not less than $10 an acre, if the land was outside of the 15-mile limit from a railroad, and not less than $20 an acre where it was inside of the 15-mile limit, the Government had a right to appraise the coal lands for what was thought proper. In this case the lands have been appraised by the Geological Survey; they have been appraised at from $20 up to $60 an acre, and, I am informed, there are instances where coal lands have been appraised in some localities as high as $200 an acre, and in some cases even at $400 an acre, but this appraisal put the price of the land higher than the minimum fixed by the statute. The St. Paul Railroad can not as a railroad, under the Hepburn Act, buy any of this coal land; they can not acquire it directly, but a subsidiary company asks to be authorized to enter 1,440 acres of these coal lands at the appraised value. Under the amendment of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which has been adopted, the coal taken from this land thus acquired by the company of 1,440 acres can only be devoted to furnishing motive power for the railroad company; it can not be used for any other purpose; in other words, it must be used according to the spirit of the Hepburn Act.

While I am a great reformer—at least I hope I am—and while I am anxious to protect the Federal Government in its coal lands, in its timberlands, and in all its other natural resources, it does seem to me—and I say it without intending to criticize any Member of this body—that where a great transcontinental line within the last five years has built from the Missouri River out to the Pacific coast, a distance of 1,400 or 1,500 miles, without a dollar of subsidy, alongside a road that got every odd section within 40 miles on each side of its road, that this transcontinental line, the junior one of the three, ought to have this little privilege of getting coal on 1,440 acres of land. It seems to me very small business to be haggling over this matter.

I can not see any danger in this measure to the interests of the Government; I can not see any undue advantage proposed to be given to this company. They are simply to get this coal for the purpose of operating their road, and for no other purpose. I am no more a friend of the railroads than any other Senator in this body; and yet it does look to me as though to stay here and haggle over this question of whether we will let the company get the coal in 1,440 acres of land is taking a rather narrow and close view of it.

We are proud of our great railroads in the West. The Northern Pacific road, with all its land grants—and it got immense land grants—has proved of great value in the development and growth of that section of the country; the Great Northern, built without any land grant at all, has perhaps proved of still greater value to that region of country. Now, covering a part of the territory below these two lines, a part of the territory which needed railroads to secure the development of that country, we have this younger railroad, the Milwaukee & St. Paul, and they come here and say, "Let us have the privilege of buying from Uncle Sam the coal in 1,440 acres of land." That is all there is in this joint resolution.

The Senator from Washington referred to another matter. He said the other day that the Northern Pacific had got the Government to take over the Mount Rainier Park. That was a good many years ago. Within the limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific, out in the State of Washington, not a great distance from the city of Seattle, was a great, high, rough mountain, with very little timber on it, covering hundreds and perhaps thousands of acres. The Northern Pacific was entitled to every odd section of that land. Many years ago, through the efforts of the Representatives of the State of Washington, prior to the enactment of the Hepburn law, legislation was passed by which that mountain range was created into a Government park. The Northern Pacific, being deprived of its odd sections in that park, was given lieu land; and the Senator says the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. has bought up that land. He is mistaken about that. Those lieu lands which the Northern Pacific acquired in that way have been bought up chiefly by the great lumber king, Mr. Weyerhaeuser, of whom you have all heard. I understand that he bought as much as a million acres from the railroad of what we call lieu-land scrip. I became aware of that from the fact that Mr. Weyerhaeuser has been trying to locate that scrip in the State of Minnesota on our land. Our homestead settlers have been fighting that effort, and I have represented some of them not as an attorney but as a friend of the homestead settlers in heading off that claim.

There was to my mind a legislative iniquity perpetrated when Mount Rainier was made into a park for the purpose of giving the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. an opportunity to get rid of those rocky acres in that park, and giving them lieu-land selections, with the privilege of selecting good timberlands anywhere. But while the wrong was perpetrated in that case, why should we now charge the Milwaukee & St. Paul with that injustice?

I dislike to differ from the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]; I know he is sincere and conscientious; but he has called attention to another fact, that the St. Paul Railroad has been guilty of some bad bookkeeping. That may possibly be so. If they have indulged in bad bookkeeping, I take it it was for the purpose of keeping up the credit of the road, and not for the purpose of robbing the Federal Government of any coal lands. While I believe that we should conserve our coal lands as far as possible, here I think is an instance of a great transcontinental line which has been lately built, without Government aid, which is seeking to acquire this little bit of fuel on 1,440 acres for the use of its road. Nearly all the coal in the immediate neighborhood is taken up, either covered by the grant to the Northern Pacific or absorbed by private parties.

In respect to the surface entrymen, the Senator from Wyoming stated the law correctly. If these lands are coal lands, they could not be entered under the stone and timber act. Under recent legislation that we have passed we allow men to enter the surface of coal lands, reserving the coal to the Government; we allow the homesteaders to go and make homestead entries, prove up, and acquire the surface for agricultural purposes under the homestead law; but the coal itself is reserved to the Government. In this case I do not care whether you sell the land, allow the company to buy it, or whether you allow the company to lease it.

I desire to call attention to another fact. If you adopt the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] in reference to leasing, it does not contain the beneficial restriction that was incorporated in the joint resolution by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. If they can lease the land for 20 years on a royalty, the Republic Coal Co. can sell the coal to anybody. They are not limited as they are in the amendment of the Senator from Montana. Under his amendment, whether they buy that land—and it is left optional with the Secretary of the Interior whether he sells it to them or leases it to them—the coal can only be utilized for motive power for this railroad, and not for the purpose of speculating in coal or controlling the coal market in any direction.

I sympathize with the people of the West who are opposed to the leasing system. I have myself been greatly in doubt about whether a leasing system or the sale of the lands is best for the country. However the great question shall be solved as to what is the best future policy of the Government, whether we should resort to a sale of our coal lands or whether we should lease them, in this case, where the coal is wanted for a great transcontinental line in order to furnish it with fuel, I do not think we ought to stand on any ceremony or insist on any abstract rule either as to selling or as to leasing.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. This resolution is one in which I take a great deal of interest, and after carefully considering it I have come to the conclusion that no matter which way one votes on it he is going to vote wrong. The proposition is one wherein we must either grant a special privilege by passing an act of special legislation for the benefit of an individual company, which method of legislation is always wrong and vicious in principle, or, if we vote the other way, we assist in placing the company which seeks the special privilege of mining this coal for use on its railway in the hands of its competitors, the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific Railways, to the detriment of the public. A vote, then, for the joint resolution is one in favor of special and class legislation, and the other is a vote in behalf of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and Great Northern Railway and assists them in keeping a rival from getting into a territory where the people need their services.

Under the original land grant which the Northern Pacific secured, it acquired title to coal lands sufficient for its own uses. Later along came the Great Northern on its way across the country, and it met with the same obstacle which now is presented to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, at the time that road was built this new rule requiring an appraisement and insisting on leasing which is now in force in the Land Office had not been adopted.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, my reason for making that statement was that in order to secure coal for the use of the Great Northern Railway that company was compelled to build a line of road up the Kootenay River for 150 miles, to the summit of the Rocky Mountains in Canada, to the Crows Nest Pass, and is now securing its coal and its coke from that district for the use of its road over a large portion of territory. From those coal mines are coming out each day 500 carloads of coal and coke, and the output will double within the next year or two. It is a fine quality of coal.

The Great Northern and the Northern Pacific are in a sort of partnership. In some way or another the two roads are in harmony, and here comes another road, and it asks for an opportunity to secure fuel without hauling it all the way from the Pacific coast to the Rocky Mountains for the eastbound traffic and from Chicago or Colorado or Wyoming to supply its needs west of those points. They ought to be allowed to secure coal.

Yet I do not like to vote for a bill granting a special privilege; it is always wrong; it amounts in this case to correcting one error by making another; yet at the same time I do not see how this road can successfully operate and carry on its business unless it is allowed that privilege.

The point which I wish to make, however, was that I am considerably puzzled in regard to this matter, and I feel sure that whichever way I vote I will vote wrong, and that I may and probably will have occasion later on to regret it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield, and to whom?

Mr. NELSON. I yielded temporarily to the Senator from Oregon, as I supposed, for an interrogatory.

Mr. LANE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he had concluded.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment to make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield, and to whom?

Mr. NELSON. I wanted to make one further statement, but I will yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent that we begin to vote on this joint resolution and all amendments not later than 5 o'clock on this day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the roll would have to be called before that request could be made.

Mr. SMOOT. I should object to it, at any rate.

Mr. MYERS. Then I will not make the request, as I do not care to put the Senate to the trouble of having a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is interposed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was shocked and surprised at the theory advanced by the Senator from Minnesota, which resolves itself down to about this: That, inasmuch as in the earlier days of railroad schemes, theories, and methods, we permitted the Northern Pacific to acquire every other section of land along its right of way, it would be manifestly unjust not to place any railroad constructed to-day upon the same plane, and in order that the Milwaukee Railroad shall be placed upon the same plane, it is proposed to turn over to the Republic Coal Co. a sufficient amount of land approximately to accomplish that end. Whether or not the Republic Coal Co. have means of getting coal, I do not know, but I say that if I buy a site for a mill I do not necessarily buy a coal mine, nor do I buy the waterfall which may be near it. If the Republic Coal Co. and the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. can not get coal, I insist that they shall do what every individual is compelled to do, buy it and pay for it. If, according to the theories which have been advanced by both Senators from Montana, there is such a miserable pittance in mining coal anyway, it is difficult to understand why the company should desire to acquire the coal lands. I am opposed utterly and absolutely to the joint resolution.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] for reminding me of one fact in respect to the Great Northern Railroad, and that is if you look at the map you would find that in its transit to the Pacific, after it leaves the junction of the Helena line at Havre, going up the Milk River Valley, it approaches pretty near the boundary line of Canada, and, as the Senator from Oregon has stated, it has built a short branch line from its line there up into the Kootenay country in Canada, where it has secured an abundance of coal, because in Canada they do not have any such restrictions as we have in this country. So that the Northern Pacific, Mr. President, because of its rich and liberal land grant, has an ample supply of coal, and the Great Northern, by reason of its situation close to the boundary line and its access to the coal of British Columbia in the Kootenay country, is well supplied with coal. The Milwaukee & St. Paul road is south of these two lines, and it is difficult for it, under the legislation now prevailing, to secure any coal. The object of this legislation, with the adoption of the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], is simply to allow the Republic Coal Co. to get coal on 1,440 acres for the benefit of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad for motive-power purposes and not for commercial purposes. That is all there is to this joint resolution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to make this observation: This joint resolution has been under discussion now for almost a week. It is of that character of legislation that a plain statement upon one side of the case, which ought not to consume more than an hour, and a statement on the other side, which ought not to consume as much time, ought to have closed the debate. I do not say that to criticize anybody, but this joint resolution well illustrates how the Senate takes up its time with small matters, and when great matters come up we frequently find ourselves pressed for time. There are 1,440 acres of coal land involved—not the ownership, but the mere right to lease—and I hope that we can either vote now or agree unanimously upon some hour to vote upon the measure.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us vote now.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, for the purpose of expediting matters, I will say that the Senator from North Dakota has not incorporated in his amendment the amendment which I tendered to the original draft, and I simply desire to say that if his amendment shall carry I shall offer as an amendment to it the amendment proposed by me to the original joint resolution.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be very glad to accept the amendment of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LODGE. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to lease to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of, and doing business in, the State of Montana, the coal deposits in and under the following described lands, situate in Musselshell County, State of Montana, to wit: Section 30, township 8 north, range 26 east; section 6, township 7 north, range 26 east; northeast quarter of southeast quarter and southeast quarter of northeast quarter and west half of southwest quarter, section 26, township 8 north, range 25 east. The terms of the lease shall be such as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, but the period of the lease shall not be more than 20 years, and the Republic Coal Co. shall pay a royalty of not less than 5 cents per ton on all the coal mined under the lease: Provided, That one-half of the amount received by the Government as rental or royalty shall be paid into the treasury of the State of Montana for the benefit of the public schools of that State and the other one-half shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may reserve authority to cancel the lease for failure to operate or mine: Provided further, That said lease shall be made subject to the legal or equitable rights, inchoate or vested, acquired by any entryman on any part of said lands including coal or other minerals prior to the execution of said lease.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply want to state that the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], providing that the Republic Coal Co. shall not have the right to sell coal to anyone except the railroad company, will be offered to my amendment if it shall be adopted.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask, Mr. President, does the proposed substitute direct the Secretary of the Interior to lease?

Mr. GRONNA. No; it does not. It simply authorizes or empowers him to do so. The word "direct" has been stricken out.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It authorizes him to lease?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Or sell?

Mr. GRONNA. No; not to sell, but simply to lease.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I will vote against that, too.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] in the nature of a substitute. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to be here during all of this discussion, and, if I may be permitted to do so, I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota why a specific lessee is named in the joint resolution? Why not authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease the lands generally? Possibly my question has been answered.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, we have been discussing that question for three days.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to say that I have not been able to be in the Chamber because of other engagements.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, since the Senator from Ohio has directed his inquiry to me, I will simply say that this is not my joint resolution. I have merely tried to make some improvements in the joint resolution, and I think the Senate has improved it.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. NORRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the joint resolution reaches that stage I desire to say that I regret very much that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is not here. He invited attention to the last amendment offered by me to the joint resolution and made a suggestion which I think is very worthy of consideration. The joint resolution as amended reads:

That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed to deny to the State of Montana the right to assess for taxation.

The Senator from New Mexico urged that although there was nothing in this act which denied the State of Montana the right to assess, the denial of the right to tax arose from something else. Therefore I should like to ask to insert the words "or in any other act of Congress," so that it will read:

That nothing in this act or in any other act of Congress contained.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. How would it read, then?

Mr. WALSH. It would read in this way:

That nothing in this act or in any other act of Congress contained shall be deemed to deny to the State of Montana the right to assess for taxation and to levy taxes upon the right and interest in the said lands which may be acquired under the terms of this act.

I move to amend the joint resolution in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are we to set aside now the record as made? The joint resolution has been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and has been read the third time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understood the Senator to desire to amend it in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are beyond that point, unless it is set aside.

Mr. WALSH. I beg pardon. I understood that the joint resolution was in the Senate, and open to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; we have passed that point. The joint resolution has been ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and is ready for its passage, unless that action is to be set aside.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am very sorry that I did not act more quickly in order to get in an amendment which I understand the Senator from Montana is willing to agree to, that is designed to protect the rights of these entrymen. I ask unanimous consent that I may offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the better parliamentary procedure would be for the Senator to ask unanimous consent that the vote whereby the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading be abrogated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the vote whereby the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time will be set aside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does that require unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I think I shall object. It seems to me we ought to get a vote on the joint resolution at some time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, then, Shall the joint resolution pass? On that question the Senator from Nebraska demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY].

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], I withhold my vote on account of his absence.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with that Senator. Not knowing how he would vote if present I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is paired with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]; the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]; the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]; and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 28, as follows:

TRADING IN COTTON.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 110.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 243, Senate bill 110.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill stated by him. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like, before I vote, to know what the bill is about, if the Secretary will be kind enough to read the bill by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cotton separately.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there was so much confusion here that we could not hear the motion of the Senator from South Carolina. I should like to inquire what the motion was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was to take up Senate bill 110, the title of which has just been read.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to make just one observation in relation to it before I consent.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is my understanding that the Chair had already announced the result of the vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not responsible for the confusion in the Senate. The question was put and decided by the Chair, and the bill is before the Senate not with the intention of taking any advantage of any Senator, but because the Chair assumed that the Senate desired to take up the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to make a statement in this matter for the benefit of those who sit in the back row. It is hard enough to sit in the back row, anyhow.

We could not hear a single thing that went on with relation to this motion, as there was so much confusion in the Chamber. I was not going to object to the motion, but I was going to draw attention to the fact that there are two notices given here—one by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] that he would move to take up a joint resolution, and the other by myself that I would move to take up Senate bill 392 at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

I do not know just what the rules are in the matter of getting up a bill. If it is to be a continuous struggle, without any regard to courtesy in the Senate, we shall all have to engage in that sort of thing. Nor do I think that one Senator who has a matter that has come before the Senate, as we supposed the bill of the Senator from North Dakota had, should give way in order that another bill may come in ahead of it where notice has been given.

I desire to observe every possible courtesy. I do not know how we are going to get bills up here, however, unless we all go into a general fight to bring up a particular bill in which we are interested. The Senator from Colorado gave his notice a week before the Senator from South Carolina gave his. I am not going to object, but if necessary I am going into a fight to see if I can not get my bill up here, too.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, referring to this matter of giving notices on the calendar that on some day in the future some Senator intends to move to take up a certain bill on his own initiative, I deny that that gives him any right above any other Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is an innovation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether it is or not, in my opinion it is an assumption.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is an ancient practice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether it is an ancient practice or not, I do not think the malpractice, as I regard it, is to be honored because of its antiquity.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is not a new practice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be an ancient abuse or a modern innovation in that line; but the truth is that a bill can be taken up here in but one of two ways, and that is by the Senate unanimously consenting to take it up or by motion made and carried to proceed to its consideration. Now, I am interested in some bills, but I never have felt that I could maintain myself in accusing some one of not being courteous to me in a senatorial way, when I had printed on the calendar a notice that next Friday, for instance, I should move or try to take up some bill, if he made a similar motion at that time. I never thought that that waived all other Senators off the track. A Senator who objects to that proceeding is not discourteous. In my opinion the discourtesy, if any there is, in connection with that sort of a transaction comes from the Senator who tries to assume some right irrespective of the views of his colleagues.

In this particular case the Senator does make his motion, and he is not standing upon any notice, even if he gave any. The effect of his motion, if it is carried, would be to make this bill the unfinished business and to have it before us every day two hours after the Senate convenes until it is disposed of. I prefer to have some other bill taken up, and I shall vote against this motion. That is nothing but my right, and nobody will object to it; but the idea that anybody can preempt any right by stating his intention upon the calendar I wish to deny.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Iowa that we ought to have some understood method of conducting the business of the Senate. We have been going on now for quite a while with first one man getting up and saying "I give notice that on Tuesday after the morning hour I shall make an address upon subject No. 1"; another man says, "On Wednesday after the morning hour I shall deliver an address upon subject No. 2"; the third man gives a similar notice about subject No. 3, and then a Senator rises and says, "I give notice that upon a certain day in the future I shall move to take up from the calendar bill No. 40," and another Senator says, "Upon a certain other day in the future I shall move to take up from the calendar bill No. 50." Meanwhile the calendar of the Senate is lying here unacted upon.

There are more important bills upon the calendar than any of these concerning which notice has been given. For example, there is House bill 6282, with the amendments made by the Senate committee, the bill to fulfill our treaty obligations concerning cocaine and opium, and a great many other things. I have never felt like asking that it be taken up to the detriment of other measures upon the calendar; but it seems to me the time has about come to stop farming out the floor of the Senate for the future; to have the calendar read at least twice a week, if not oftener, whenever it is in order to read it; and to let the bills upon the calendar be disposed of according to the right of the matter as seen by Senators themselves.

I hope that for the future Senators will not regard notices they have given of the fact that they want to speak or that they want to make a motion concerning a bill as unanimous consent granted by the Senate that all other business shall be overridden in order that they shall speak or in order that they shall make the motion.

Not long ago a Senator objected to a bill being considered on the ground that he had given notice that on that day he would make a speech upon a totally different subject. I am no scold, and I am no critic. I mention that bill simply because I happened to report it from the Finance Committee, as the chairman of the subcommittee ordered to consider it. I give notice now, if any notices are to go on the calendar, that immediately after all the other notices are over I am going to call up that bill; but I would a great deal rather have the Senate proceed to consider the calendar in its regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few days ago I made substantially the same observations that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has made in much better language than I used. It is an innovation upon the customs of the Senate, to say the least.

There are on the calendar at present notices of three Senators that upon the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution that has just been disposed of they would move to take up certain measures. Of course, they could not all get recognition, and it would simply result in a scramble.

I sympathize with what the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has just said. There are 131 bills on the calendar now. Formerly we did not allow the calendar to get clogged in this way. When the routine morning business was disposed of at least a couple of times a week we took up the calendar and went through it and disposed of a great many important measures.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption in line with what he is stating?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me, and I presume it seems to the Senator, that if we pursue this course only the bills which have behind them the most insistent and persistent men can be considered at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, certainly. We will take up only the limited number that have been placed on the calendar under the head of "Notices," and the result will be that we will have 50 there pretty soon. The Senator from Mississippi will have his special bill, I may have one, every other Senator will do the same thing, and of course it will be for the Chair to recognize some Senator to make a motion. That is the privilege and the duty of the Chair. I confess, however, that I think we ought at least to pay some attention to the calendar and that we ought not to lumber up the calendar, under the head of "Notices," with so many bills.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a parliamentary question. What is before the Senate at the present time?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I was discussing the cotton bill, which the Chair announced was before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. WARREN. Just a word as to what has been said before about these notices. It has grown up, evidently, out of the former custom of giving notice of a speech, so that those who wished to be present and hear what was said about a given subject would be present. The notices, so far as bills are concerned, were formerly considered to be merely to notify those who had a particular interest in those bills. For instance, in the case of an appropriation bill, the chairman gives notice that he will undertake to get it up so that his committee members and others who are interested in it may be present; but it gives no privilege, in my judgment, and I think it should not be so treated.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has been here probably longer than anybody else. I will ask him whether these notices have ever been given heretofore except as to appropriation bills?

Mr. WARREN. I think they have.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it not very rarely that any notice is ever given as to any other bill?

Mr. WARREN. Very rarely; and they have not been given preference over the consideration of the calendar nor over other bills, except so far as I said before, as a notification to those interested to be on the lookout for the particular measure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word, because my name has been referred to with relation to the notice which I gave on the 2d of March.

I gave notice at that time that after the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 1, which has been disposed of, and also after the consideration of Senate bill No. 120, I should call up Senate joint resolution No. 10, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and fixing the time for the convening of Congress and the terms of the President and Vice President. As my notice was subject to the consideration of the bill of the Senator from North Dakota, I have not objected, on the theory that he was holding his position, and that as soon as his bill was finished mine would be in order. Believing in that, that is the position I have taken. Consequently I have objected to no motion up to this time. I hope that after the Senator from South Carolina finishes his bill I will have a right to proceed with the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 10.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to have the original bill and the proposed substitute read.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me to move an executive session?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 25, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Teach us, O Lord our God and our Father, amid the busy whirl and turmoil of life's activities, with its complex and unsolved problems, to be true to Thee, to our fellow men, and to ourselves, that we may measure up to the highest ideals of manhood, revealed in the life and character of the world's great Exemplar. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R.

13612) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The unfinished business is House bill 14330, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 14330, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 14330, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14330) to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed. This act shall take effect one month from the date of its passage.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, section 10 of the bill was read last Wednesday. Section 11 has not yet been read, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has just read section 11.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, sundry amendments have been made to the bill, and I move, then, that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably to the House with the amendments that have been passed by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14330) to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor, had directed him as Chairman to report back the same with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to recommit the bill H. R. 14330 to the Committee on Labor, with instructions to that committee to report said bill back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Add at the end of section 1, as a part of said section, the following:

"That no goods, wares, articles, and merchandise, except immediate products of agriculture, forests, and fisheries, manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country principally by children under 14 years of age, in countries where they have no laws regulating child labor, shall be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited. Any shipment consigned for entry at any of the ports of the United States of goods, wares, articles, and merchandise, except immediate products of agriculture, forests, and fisheries, manufactured in any foreign country, province, or dependency, where the industrial employment of children not regulated by law shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the shipper of such merchandise or his legal agent, to the effect that the merchandise covered by the invoice has not been manufactured principally by children under 14 years of age, the form of the affidavit to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is also authorized and directed to issue such further regulations and to collect all information pertinent thereto through cooperation with the Consular Service of the United States as may be necessary for the enforcement of the provision."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on the amendment. I make the point of order that a motion to recommit, with direction that the committee amend the bill and report it back, must be such an amendment as would be permissible in the House or in Committee of the Whole; and I make the point of order that that being the rule, this amendment is not germane to the bill and to the section where it is offered.

This is a bill, Mr. Speaker, to prohibit the importation of goods made by convict labor and by those who are confined under government control, such as the inmates of workhouses and eleemosynary institutions. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as I could gather it from the reading, provides for the exclusion of goods made by children under 14 years of age, but as the gist of the amendment——

Mr. MURDOCK. Made in countries that have child-labor laws. Is not that right?

Mr. MANN. No; in countries which do not have child-labor laws.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood it just that way—in countries that have no child-labor laws.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood it the other way.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is the same amendment, Mr. Chairman, that was offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a few days ago, when this bill was under consideration. That was last Wednesday. Am I correct about that?

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. With pleasure.

Mr. ADAMSON. I presume it is a little incongruous to mix up innocent children with convicts and inmates of penitentiaries.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think my colleague is correct. That would be an argument to the merits of the amendment. I am endeavoring now to call to the attention of the Speaker the rule that this amendment proposed by this motion is not germane to this bill. The purport of this bill and the intent of it, Mr. Speaker, as I have endeavored to call to the attention of the Speaker, is to prohibit the importation of goods manufactured by convict labor.

Now, the goods manufactured by child labor are an entirely distinct proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. On the question of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Was not practically this same amendment offered in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BARTLETT. I so stated.

Mr. MURDOCK. And held to be in order.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; the point of order was not made against it, as I recall.

Mr. MURDOCK. My recollection is the point of order was made against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. MANN. The point of order was made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] and subsequently was withdrawn.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand. I said it was not made, but was reserved, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. It was made, and while we were arguing the point of order it was withdrawn.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and it was withdrawn because the gentleman from Maryland, as I understand, believed it was more economical in the matter of time and in the interest of the bill that the merits of the proposition should be voted upon rather than that the time should be taken in discussing the point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. I think it was obvious that the point of order was withdrawn, because on the argument it appeared clearly that no point of order would lie.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know whether that is true or not. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] did not so state. At least that is not my recollection of the purpose of the gentleman in withdrawing the point of order, but it was because he did not want to take up the time of the Committee of the Whole, and he was perfectly willing to submit the question to the committee, which voted it down.

Now, I have not the authorities before me, because I was not aware that this motion was to be made, but I call attention to the fact that when another similar amendment was up before the Committee of the Whole there were a number of authorities cited; and I invoke the rule that no motion to recommit can be entertained if the amendment proposed would not be permissible during the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that particular rule to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BARTLETT. Very well. The question then simply resolves itself into whether this amendment would, if offered in the Committee of the Whole, be held by the Chair to be germane to this bill, and I present that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Georgia if practically the same proposition was not offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY]?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. And passed on by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; that is true. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], overruled the point of order. That is true.

The SPEAKER. Then the whole thing resolves itself into this: Are there two classes of labor enumerated in the bill, or is there only one?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Only one.

Mr. BARTLETT. Only one.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Labor which is in an involuntary relation.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was the answer I made to the Chairman of the committee at the time when he asked the same question, that there was only one class. There may be two different varieties.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that convict labor and pauper labor is only one class?

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not so contend and do not so contend; but I will say to the gentleman that pauper labor, as dealt with by this bill, is defined in section 9.

Mr. MADDEN. It makes two classes.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; it makes only one class. Section 9 of the bill defines what it means by the term "pauper" and declares—

That the term "pauper," as used in this act, shall be limited to those persons who are held or confined in eleemosynary institutions at the public expense, in whole or in part.

So that there is only one genus of labor, so to speak, one kind, one class—those who work as convicts in institutions established for the confinement and punishment of criminals and those who are held in institutions at public expense, who have not their freedom.

Mr. BORLAND. Even if it made two classes—convict labor and pauper labor—it would not be in order to add a third class, to wit, child labor.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think so, under the rule.

The SPEAKER. It has been held so often that it is not debatable that if there are two or more classes enumerated then you can add another.

Mr. BARTLETT. I call the attention of the Speaker to the decision that he made upon the cotton-futures bill; that where the bill simply referred to the sale of cotton futures the Speaker declined to permit an amendment to include grain, oats, corn, hay, and those things. The Speaker made that ruling.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the Speaker in making that ruling stated that if two things had been included in the bill a third might have been added by amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Very well. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] being in the chair, an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] to insert in section 1 a provision which would make a prohibition against the importation of goods manufactured or prepared in whole or in part by the aid of children under 14 years of age.

A point of order was made that that amendment was not germane to the bill, and quite an extended discussion was had on the point of order. The Chair [Mr. FOSTER] held the amendment in order. The amendment was defeated in the Committee of the Whole, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] offered another amendment to come in at the end of section 1, covering the same question of child labor in different language and in less extended form. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] made the point of order that the Anderson amendment was not in order, because it was in substance the same as the amendment which the committee had already voted down. Of course, if it was in substance the same, then the Chair would have been compelled to hold it in order if it had been the first amendment offered. The Chair held that it was in substance the same, and ruled it out on the ground that the committee had already voted upon that proposition. Subsequently the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] offered an amendment which is in precisely the same language as the amendment which I have proposed in the motion to recommit. Against that amendment the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] again made the point of order, on the ground that it was in substance the same as the amendment previously offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], which had already been voted down.

So, under the ruling of the Chair, that amendment would have been in order if it had been the first amendment proposed. The matter was quite fully discussed in the committee. A number of gentlemen were heard upon it. The Chair ruled it in order on the ground, as I recall, that the bill covering two classes of goods or goods prepared by two different classes of persons, one convicts and the other paupers, under the well-recognized parliamentary rules you could add a third clause. That is the amendment which is now proposed.

The bill prohibits the importation of goods prepared in whole or in part by convict labor or pauper labor. This amendment proposes also to prohibit the importation of goods manufactured—it does not cover other goods; it does not cover forestry products or agricultural products—goods manufactured in whole or in part by children under the age of 14 years coming from those countries which do not have any child-labor laws. I think, under the well-recognized construction of the rules, it is simply adding a third class to two classes already in the bill of a somewhat similar character.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether he thinks the two classes he mentions in the bill are one?

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly evident to my mind—I may be wrong—that there are two classes in the bill now. Certainly no one can contend that convicts and paupers are in the same class. Convicts are accused of and convicted of a criminal offense and confined by reason of the crime. It would be a strange claim to say that the poor are subjects of charity because they have committed a crime. I do not think it is yet a crime to be poor. The question of whether a person is poor is relative, and unless the gentlemen are prepared to say that it is a crime to be poor, certainly there are two classes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with one subject, and that is the products of involuntary labor, where the wage paid and pro tanto the price of the product is not determined by the factors active in a competitive market, but by State policies, wholly independent of the laws which determine the price of commodities or the price of human labor.

The Democratic position, I may say, has been that a reasonable amount of competition of American products with foreign-made products represents a rational public policy, represents, besides, a necessary measure of protection to the home consumer.

Now, that principle is an accepted principle, and may be said to be the dominant principle in the Underwood law. The object of this legislation is to effectuate the provision in the Underwood law that goods made under circumstances where the laws of the market do not determine the cost of the product in foreign countries, namely, that goods made by men who are slaves to the law and have no voice in making the wages they receive or the price of the product, that they shall be excluded from competition with the products of our home market.

Now, that represents one class, namely, the products of all in the class whose wages are not determined under the influence of freedom of contract—the convict held or confined in the penitentiary or the pauper held or confined in an eleemosynary institution sustained in whole or in part at the public expense.

The design of the bill was to make them one class, as is evidenced by section 9, which defines the word "pauper." The word "pauper" in its ordinary meaning has rather a wide range—a range to which I think one of the gentlemen on the other side said he was willing to assign every person who worked for 10 or 20 cents a day, although that might be the normal wage in the country where they were laboring. But to make it sure that the word "pauper" as popularly interpreted was not the kind of subject matter meant to be included this definition was put in the bill:

SEC. 9. That the term "pauper," as used in this act, shall be limited to those persons who are held or confined in eleemosynary institutions at the public expense in whole or in part.

Now, when the bill says "who are held or confined and sustained in whole or in part at public expense," that refers to a business state of affairs, or wage and price-making relations, where the pauper of this bill differs not a whit from the convict of the bill. The subject is one, the conditions are identical, the analysis is identical, the object is identical, and the condition calling for the remedy is identical, namely, the condition under which a product having a price not made by the normal elements of labor cost, but into which a State subsidy partly enters. It is this product, the joint result of State subsidy and involuntary labor, which constitutes the subject; and it is this product which the bill would exclude from our markets.

Now, that product differs entirely from child-made goods, because the wages of childhood are determined under factors of competition.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I notice you have three terms in line 4, "convict, pauper, or prison labor." Why do you have the term "prison labor," if it does not mean convict labor?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I will have to excuse myself from answering the gentleman just now. Mr. Speaker, if I have made myself clear, the object of this legislation is to put the ban on articles of manufacture the prices of which are not determined by a free contract market where the normal wages have been paid according to the laws of the market. There are two classes of workers that come under that condition; but their product constitutes but one class of subject matter, and that is the product of involuntary labor by the convict or pauper held or confined in a public place of detention. It matters not, however, to the commerce affected what the cause of the incarceration may be, whether it is criminal delinquency or the misfortune of the individual, if his wages are not paid according to the law of the markets, then his product will not have the price determined by the law of the market. It is products of that character that constitute the single subject of this legislation and which it seeks to exclude from the free commerce of the country. Clearly there is but one class here, there is but one evil to be remedied, and the one subject matter of this bill is the products of involuntary, publicly paid labor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I do.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, a while ago I asked the gentleman a question purely for information and not to be captious, and that was why three terms were used in the bill. The answer of the gentleman was not satisfactory. I understand that the gentleman says that the three will be included under the term "involuntary service." If the gentleman is speaking of one term as involuntary service divided into three parts—convict, pauper, and prison labor—would not a child under 14 years of age, working in a country without child-labor laws, be also performing involuntary service?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. No; it would not be involuntary service in any legal sense; and, moreover, the element of subsidy would be absent. The public would not be paying the difference in the wage; but for the convict and pauper, as restrictively defined in this bill, the public may be paying at least a part of the wage.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman take the position that a charity-sustained widow and a convict serving a life sentence for a crime are two parties of identically the same class?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I do not see the relevancy of the gentleman's question to the point of order raised. If the gentleman wants to put the child labor of foreign countries in the same class with convict labor, well and good.

Mr. BRYAN. But the gentleman does not do so.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. That is the gentleman's position.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is it not a fact that the purpose of this bill is to protect free labor as against labor confined in public institutions and partially maintained by public institutions? The purpose of the bill is to protect the free labor of the country against one class of labor, which is a class that is confined in public institutions. We do not ask protection against the product of the criminal because he is a convict, but it is because he is held at public expense, and therefore he is able to make these goods in a manner that the free labor and manufacturers outside of prison can not compete with. The labor that produces manufactured articles in other institutions is also sustained by public funds, and therefore it puts the manufacturer at the same disadvantage, and also the free workmen at the same disadvantage. Therefore it is absolutely clear to me that it is only one class of labor against which this bill provides protection for free labor—not that we undertake to class a widow such as that referred to by the gentleman from Washington with a criminal. It is not a question of whether the class of those who do the work is the same, but the manufactured article produced is exactly the same, and the effect is the same upon competition with free labor and free manufacture.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I will answer and say that the gentleman has succinctly stated the point. It is an effort to protect free labor of this country against competition of involuntary, law-slave labor abroad. The rule of germaneness may be fairly invoked on this subject. This bill is an effort to make effective a principle stated in a short section of the Underwood tariff law, which has been a principle of tariff legislation since the early nineties, and which has been carried in all the tariff legislation of the country since that time.

If this amendment be in order on the superficial argument that the bill deals with two classes of labor and that a third class, a fourth class, a fifth and a sixth class, and so on ad infinitum, become admissible by way of amendment, we might be called upon to seriously alter all of the tariff legislation of the country, without any study of the subject by the committee reporting the bill—indeed, without any right on the part of that committee to study that subject at all, under the rules of the House. I can say this, from such knowledge as I possess of this subject matter, that if this amendment were to prevail this great country, instead of achieving its purpose when converting this House into a Democratic body, of pulling down prohibitory restrictions on its commerce, would be writing on the statute books an absolutely prohibitory tariff bill against perhaps nine-tenths of its foreign commerce. Nine-tenths of the beneficent commerce of this country would pass away as the rainbow passes away if this amendment were to pass into the form of law. Those who want to kill the effort to protect the free labor of this country against the involuntary unpaid labor of other countries could not select a better method of doing it than to offer the amendment now before the Speaker for decision, because if that were made a condition, sine quo non, upon the passage of this bill, within two days we should be hearing from all over this country of the incredible folly of destroying its foreign commerce and half the public revenues without rhyme or reason. A majority of the country may well be in favor of barring foreign child-made goods under certain circumstances, but their program when it comes will be sincere and rationally worked out, and earnestly presented to our committees for proper consideration, and not as a mere device to win some calculated party advantage.

I believe the rule of germaneness, as contended for in this case, would affect the good sense of its authors, applied under the point of order which has been made.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the gentleman from Maryland on this proposition. If you are going to add an amendment excluding goods in which child labor has been used to any extent, you are going to bar out a great number of products now made in the homes in Switzerland, Germany, France, and other countries. The labor is not used as child labor for the sake of cheapness of labor, but because goods are made in the homes there by artisans, mechanics, weavers, and spinners; and the children are used, not as a labor factor, but because they are being raised up as weavers, as such; and that is why home industry is largely encouraged in Germany.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. METZ. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is not that also true in the United States to a certain extent?

Mr. METZ. To a limited extent, but not as largely as it is abroad. Take a country like Saxony, where they had practically stopped home industry entirely. They are now installing electric motors in the homes where the looms are—not because the goods are cheaper, but because they get original designs—and they are bringing up the children to follow in the footsteps of the father. Those children may go to the loom for half an hour a day, say.

Mr. MADDEN. Still it is child labor, is it not?

Mr. METZ. To an extent it is so, but not as to a condition of labor in the sense of being a sweatshop. The work that is conducted is in the nature of educational work on the part of families who have been doing it for generations. There is no doubt if we had it here we would be a great deal better off in our labor conditions.

Mr. MADDEN. We pass laws restrictive of our child labor.

Mr. METZ. A good many restrictions, especially in regard to sweatshop work, are justified.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not true that in those countries the children stick to the work of their forefathers and continue in that line of work?

Mr. METZ. For centuries that has been done.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not true that in the United States the disposition of the child, or even the father and mother, is to get out into some other business, where they think they can improve their condition?

Mr. METZ. The disposition here is for the child of the laborer or mechanic to wear a high collar and a boiled shirt and become a clerk.

Mr. MOORE. They want to get away from their traditional employment.

Mr. METZ. Certainly. The country is not going to get mechanics, artisans, spinners, and weavers and skilled labor of that sort by this kind of legislation and will practically stop a very large percentage of foreign imports of goods not made here at all by any class of labor.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me that this question ought to be a very difficult one for the Chair to determine. Here is a very succinct statement, found in section 780 of the Rules of the House of Representatives, of the rule of germaneness in this class of cases, and it is as follows:

A general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class.

Now, what is the general subject before the House for consideration in this bill? It is the exclusion of certain classes of labor. There are three classes of labor which by the terms of this act are to be excluded. They are convict labor, pauper labor, and prison labor. This amendment seeks to add another to the general class, namely, child labor. If that is not within this rule, then certainly there is no meaning to the rule. The general proposition, the general subject, being the exclusion of certain classes of labor, the question is as to whether another class of labor under the rule may be included, and that under the rule of germaneness is settled by saying that it may. It is not necessary that it be shown that the classes to be included are of like or similar character. Indeed, there is as much essential difference between pauper labor and prison labor as there would be between pauper labor and child labor, and the question is, Shall we exclude another class of labor? and the general subject for consideration is the exclusion of classes of labor that may be considered objectionable. It seems to me that there can not be any question as to the point of order, because under the rule when there is a general class under consideration named in the bill that you may add another item to the class is already determined, I think, quite clearly.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not this bill under consideration deal with that class of labor that is under some form of duress?

Mr. TOWNER. I think that duress is not mentioned in the bill, and it requires an argument upon the part of the gentleman to say that pauper labor is under duress. I would suggest to the gentleman that child labor is as much under duress as pauper labor is.

Mr. FOWLER. Under some kind of legal duress. This bill deals with labor under some kind of legal duress, and now the amendment proposes to add a character of labor not under legal duress.

Mr. TOWNER. Does the gentleman say that a child who is a minor is not under a certain form of duress?

Mr. FOWLER. Not under legal duress at all.

Mr. TOWNER. They are under legal duress because they can not control their own movements; they are subject to the domination of another; but, Mr. Speaker, that is not the question. It is not necessary to show that in the various classes of labor there would be a similarity, because the question for the consideration of the Chair is whether or not certain classes of labor shall be excluded, and they are named—three in number—and it is certainly within the rule of germaneness to add another to those named.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say upon the question of order, and that is this: This bill as it is written excludes the product of labor that is produced by persons while under some form of legal duress. Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] undertakes to deal with the products of labor produced by persons not under legal duress. Undoubtedly there is but one class of labor—one main class of labor—dealt with in this bill, and that is labor under some form of legal duress. If that be true, Mr. Speaker, then this amendment ought not to be permitted, because it seeks to amend a bill dealing with but one question only—the product of labor of persons while under legal duress.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. What kind of duress is a man under who voluntarily goes into an almshouse?

Mr. FOWLER. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. ANDERSON. What kind of duress is a man under who voluntarily goes into an almshouse? Is he under voluntary duress?

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, a man might go into any of these places on a visit, I suppose, but we are dealing with those persons entering under legal process and who are detained under some form of duress.

Mr. ANDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. FOWLER. Why, certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. He may go in voluntarily and he might leave voluntarily; if he is able to support himself, he may leave voluntarily at any time, and he is not under any duress whatever.

Mr. FOWLER. No man can get into a pauper house, and no man can get into a prison in this country, that I ever heard of, without going through some kind of legal process, unless he broke in.

Mr. ANDERSON. A man certainly can get into an almshouse voluntarily without any legal process whatever.

Mr. FOWLER. May it please the gentleman, I know that there are a good many out who ought to be in, but while that it true, yet it is nevertheless true that whoever gets into one of these places, whether it is for charity or whether it be for punishment as a criminal, gets there by some means of legal process, and is detained by legal authority. That is what this bill deals with.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does he get out by some legal process?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. FOWLER. He is released by the same authority that detains him. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said all I care to say.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule, but recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] because he demanded recognition.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have only this to say in connection with the point of order. This bill applies to products made simply by one class of people. That class is very clearly set out in section 9 of the bill, namely, that class of people "confined in eleemosynary institutions at the public expense in whole or in part."

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HENSLEY. I do.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have done my best to follow the gentleman's argument and the argument of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. If that you have just stated be true, then why in the first section of this act is there a recitation of three kinds of labor? Why was not the single word "pauper" used in that case?

Mr. HENSLEY. It seems to me that the gentleman from Kansas, by reading the bill carefully, can determine for himself that proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will read section 9, he will find there a definition of the term "pauper."

Mr. HENSLEY. That is true.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why was there not also a definition of the words "convict" and "prison"?

Mr. HENSLEY. Those terms define themselves. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that these terms are self-explanatory, and therefore no definition is required of the class to which the gentleman refers.

Here is a condition from which free labor is trying to escape; here is a condition from which the manufacturers of this country are endeavoring to escape—products that are made by a class of people in foreign countries whose labor is paid for wholly or in part by the country that maintains them and controls them. For instance, where a contractor has succeeded in getting the institution where the work is done free of rent; where they are able to get heat and water and all those things free of any cost, the labor of the inmates being sold for, say, 50 per cent of what free labor would cost. And that product made cheaply because of these conditions is put upon the market in competition with the product of free labor. That is the situation that has such a demoralizing effect upon the commerce of the country and upon free labor, and free labor and commerce are trying to escape from that very situation.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman if the three kinds mentioned in the bill are not in one class?

Mr. HENSLEY. Absolutely. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. In accordance with the construction that is put on this on the other side of the House, I want to ask if convict-made goods themselves may not be classed in a dozen different ways?

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, if one desires to be technical and critical, you can classify even the convicts into several subdivisions, but after all they fall under the one general head—convicts.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will; certainly.

Mr. MANN. Three classes being named, two of which are not defined, the gentleman must know anyone would know what they are; but the third, being defined, would not that be self-evident that they are in different classes? The two you can tell by the name and the other you have to define. Does not that show that they are different classes?

Mr. HENSLEY. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] this question in answer: Is there any occasion at all for the bill to define the classes to which you refer? This definition is placed upon that class which perhaps has become generally known as a class differing from the class defined in this bill. It is a class that is being supported wholly or in part by the country that detains them and involuntarily controls them; that class simply takes into its group the other class to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asked me a question. Will the gentleman allow me to answer it?

Mr. HENSLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is necessary to define the convict class or the prison class, but here is a third class which it is necessary to define, and which you do define, and which the very definition indicates is a different class from the two which you do not deem necessary to define.

Mr. HENSLEY. The product manufactured by the third class, let me say to the gentleman from Illinois, is exactly the product that is manufactured by the other two classes. It is the product which we complain of coming from these divisions, all of which fall under the one general class—those people who are being supported wholly or in part by the State or country. And that product, cheaply put upon the market, produces a demoralizing effect on the commerce and free labor to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The title of this bill is "A bill to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor."

The first section of the bill is—

That all goods, wares, and merchandise produced in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or prison labor, or in the production of which convict, pauper, or prison labor has been employed, either directly or indirectly, in any manner and for any purpose, * * * shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited.

And so forth. Section 9, defining paupers, provides—

That the term "pauper," as used in this act, shall be limited to those persons who are held or confined in eleemosynary institutions at the public expense in whole or in part.

Now there is no dispute—the matter having been settled long ago and having been ruled one way so often that there can not be any mistake about it—that where one subject matter is mentioned—one class, and only one—you can not add others, but if more than one are mentioned, then you can add others. The only case of this kind that the Chair remembers having ruled on himself was the cotton-futures case.

The only difficulty about the rule is in applying it. If it were not for section 9 of this act, defining a pauper, the Chair would hold that this motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to recommit with instructions is in order. But when you read the whole bill and listen to the arguments pro and con it is clear to the mind of the Chair that the one thing that this bill seeks to do is to shut out what might be called State-expedited manufactured articles; that is, where the State pays part of the cost.

The contention of the labor people has always been, as I understand it, that their objection is not to convict-made goods per se. That is not what they object to. They object to convict-made goods because the convict-made goods may be made so much more cheaply by the aid of the State, or county, or whatever it happens to be, than they could be made by free labor; and, therefore, free labor can not compete with convict labor. That is the whole of the contention, and the intent of this bill goes to that, and to that alone.

The Chair thoroughly agrees with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on the proposition that no sane man would undertake to put convicts and paupers on the same moral plane. It is a misfortune to be poor, and the poorer you are the greater the misfortune. But the intent of this bill is clearly to prohibit the importation into this country of goods, wares, and merchandise or anything of the sort that is made by laborers who do not receive the wages of free labor, but who are in some way assisted by the State.

In addition to that, while it has nothing to do with the parliamentary point, the popular acceptation of "pauper labor" in this country has been that class of labor in foreign countries which receives less wages than the American laborers get. There have been all sorts of tales told about what the wages of workmen in foreign countries are—some of them true and some of them not true—for political effect. But this bill defines what "a pauper" is for the purposes of this act.

I may be permitted to say that I am as much opposed to "child labor," as we use that term, as any living man.

There is one other remark that might be pertinent and that is if this Mann amendment were adopted it would practically put an end to commerce. So the Chair rules it out of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers a privileged motion.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. MANN. They have got beyond that point.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I was on the floor asking recognition.

The SPEAKER. The motion ought to have been made a while ago.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has not the gentleman the right to offer that, even though the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. Yes; of course. But that has nothing to do with it. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN's motion:

I move to recommit the bill H. R. 14330 to the Committee on Labor, with instructions to that committee to report said bill back forthwith, with the following amendment:

Insert, on page 1, line 4, after the word "part," the following words: "by children under the age of 14 years or."

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. FOWLER. I make a point of order on the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on the amendment that has just been offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard for a moment on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this was the amendment that was offered last Wednesday by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], and, after a much more extended debate on the point of order even than has been had before the Speaker this morning, it was held to be in order by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. It has usually been considered, where a proposition was presented in Committee of the Whole and a point of order was made upon it and the proposition was held to be in order, that the Speaker would not reverse that ruling. It is entitled to a considerable amount of weight. It is true, the Speaker has the power to reverse the ruling. It is true that when the original amendment was offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] and held to be in order, no one had yet figured out the political effect of voting upon the amendment; but after it was offered all the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House, or most of them, vigorously opposed the proposition, and this morning they come in and argue and plead with the Speaker, who I do not think would be purposely biased for political effect or otherwise. And yet it is very difficult sometimes even for as great a Speaker as the present occupant of the chair not to be somewhat influenced by the political effect, so earnestly urged by all of the gentlemen on the side of the House which made him Speaker.

When the original proposition was presented, that did not enter into the consideration of the question. I do not think that the Speaker should now hold out of order, on a motion to recommit, an amendment which, after full discussion of the subject, was held to be in order by the gentleman selected by the Speaker to preside over the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union while this bill was under consideration.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I had already made the point of order. Now I rise to inquire the status of my motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. We have passed that point, anyway.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I desire to make a few suggestions in regard to the point of order and the amendment that has been offered. My colleague [Mr. MANN] has stated that this matter was thoroughly discussed in Committee of the Whole and put, properly, to the Chairman of that committee. I deny that statement. It was not made clear to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole that the purpose of this bill was to protect one class of labor against another class; that is, to protect free labor against the labor that is confined in public institutions. No doubt it was only a question in his mind whether one class or two classes of labor were referred to in the bill; and if it had been made clear to him, which it was not—I regretted afterwards that I did not make an attempt myself to make it clear, as I understood it—that this bill was for the purpose of protecting free labor against labor in public institutions, or that class of labor that is given assistance by the State, no doubt the Chairman would have held the amendment out of order. For that reason, I do not think the Speaker, under the circumstances, should be influenced by what happened in Committee of the Whole. The argument then was not as lucid and clear as it has been made to-day; for the reason, I suppose, that it was thought the Chairman would probably understand it without any prolonged argument. The gentleman speaks about playing politics in regard to this. I will say that I am on record as to this amendment being wrongly applied to a bill of this kind, and that it should not be given favorable consideration for that reason. While the other side of the House succeeded in fooling the working people for a number of years, I do not believe they can fool them into thinking that those who vote against applying this amendment to this bill are opposed to the prohibition of child labor. Such an amendment would mean the defeat of this bill. It applies it in a way never thought of before. So far as I am concerned, I do not fear to go on record on any position that I take in regard to any sort of legislation. If I am not properly understood by my constituents, that is something which I can not help; but this amendment does not properly apply, and should not have been held in order, and it should not be held in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MANN. Before the Chair rules, will the Chair permit me to quote to him the decision of the Chairman in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. On this precise amendment, on page 5420 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date of March 18, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] in the chair, ruled as follows:

> The Chair thinks that in this bill the committee enumerated the class of persons whose labor was to be restricted from entry into the United States, and under the rule which has been cited we have in this bill already convict and pauper labor, making two classes, and the Chair thinks it is germane to add another, and therefore overrules the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a very high opinion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], and this is simply a difference of opinion as to whether the bill relates to two different classes or one class of labor. The Chair remembers a certain occasion when, on the free-list bill, a distinguished Missourian, who was chairman of the Committee of the Whole, ruled one way, and ruled correctly, as far as that was concerned. When we got back into the House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moved to recommit, and stated that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole had ruled one way, but that he would rather have the ruling of the Speaker. The Chair dislikes very much to disagree with the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union [Mr. FOSTER], but under the ruling which the Chair made about 15 minutes ago he is compelled, unless he has changed his mind in the meantime, which he has not, to rule this motion to recommit out of order.

Mr. MANN. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. MANN. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] moves to lay that appeal on the table. On that the gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 229, nays 112, answered "present" 4, not voting 87, as follows:

Mr. OLDFIELD with Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I have a general pair with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD. I therefore wish to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The Clerk called the name of Mr. MANN, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS of Maryland, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS AND MINOR CHILDREN OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN, WAR WITH SPAIN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

Mr. KEY of Ohio (when the Committee on Pensions was called). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 13044.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up the bill from the Committee on Pensions, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widow and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain or Philippine insurrection.

The SPEAKER. Automatically the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Speaker, pending going into Committee of the Whole, I desire to see if we can not get some agreement as to the time for general debate.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we have two hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate upon this bill be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SELLS]. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I do not know whether there is anyone who wants to be heard in debate upon this side or not. I think we had better not limit debate until we find out.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I have no objection. My only reason in trying to arrange for time is that a year ago substantially the same bill as this was debated on calendar Wednesday for two or three days. It was thoroughly considered, and passed the House with almost a unanimous vote. I take it that there are not many in the House at this time who want to discuss it.

Mr. MANN. If they do not care to discuss the bill, then it will not take much time. But there are many new Members in the House. It is a new House, and there may be some who want to be heard.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman think that if we omit general debate it will expedite the passage of the bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think so.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Speaker, it is well known that this bill was to be called up, and if any Members wanted time they ought to have said so before now. Does the gentleman on the other side suggest a longer time?

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to go into committee and find out how the thing stands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the gentleman from Maryland will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with Mr. LINTHICUM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 13044, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widow and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain or Philippine insurrection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Has the bill been read?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the bill be read, as it is short and will not take much time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act if any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a regular or volunteer, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow, without means of support other than her daily labor, and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year, or leaving a minor child or children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act: Provided further, That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The following committee amendments were read:

On page 1, the title of the bill to be amended so as to read as follows:

"To pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain and Philippine insurrection."

Page 1, lines 6 and 7, strike out, after the word "volunteer," "during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection."

Page 1, line 9, after the word "inclusive," to insert "service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, including all furloughs."

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this bill is designed to pension the widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served 90 days or more in the Army and Navy or the Marine Corps of the United States either as regulars or volunteers during the War with Spain or Philippine insurrection between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, and who were honorably discharged therefrom. In amended form the bill grants $12 monthly to the widow of an honorably discharged soldier or sailor who served during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection during her widowhood, and $2 a month for each minor child under the age of 16 years, provided, however, that the widow shall have married the soldier prior to the passage of this act. The pension is limited to such widow who is without means of support other than her daily labor and who has not an actual net income exceeding $250 a year.

The policy of this Government in the granting of pensions is obvious, and I am sure the membership of this House stands ready to do what may be proper and right and just in caring for the widows and orphans of soldiers of the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection.

The soldiers themselves are not asking for legislation wherein they might personally benefit. It is more important, in fact, for a soldier to have his widow and children cared for than to have a pension himself.

This bill is not lavish. It is not generous. It is simply ordinary justice. It merely puts the widows of the Spanish and Philippine Wars on the same footing with those of the Civil, Indian, and Mexican Wars. The United States Government has always maintained a high plane of financial honor and has never considered the size of its debts but only the question of whether they were just. If just, they should be paid at any cost. The sum required is comparatively insignificant for so great and wealthy a nation as ours. At the outside, the estimated cost would not be over $2,500,000.

This seems a negligible amount at a time when we are appropriating money by the millions for the construction of railroads, public buildings, the building of highways, and the like. All the projects may be meritorious, the money may be well spent, but this is a debt this Government owes.

A pension to the widows and orphans of the Spanish and Philippine Wars is a legitimate debt, the payment of which is urgent, and I hope there will be no delay about the passage of this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Merely as a matter of information for myself, may I ask the gentleman in what respect this bill differs from the pension law under which the widows and children of men who fought in the Civil War and Mexican War receive pensions?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If this bill passes, it will be substantially the same, with the exception that there is a dependent clause in this bill, which provides that the widow shall not have an income exceeding $250 a year.

Mr. HARRISON. The provisions are practically the same?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Substantially the same.

Mr. HARRISON. It now requires separate bills in order that dependents of soldiers and sailors of the Spanish-American War may receive pensions.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The widow of a Spanish War veteran or member of the Regular Establishment, in order to secure a pension, must prove that the disability of the soldier is the result of his Army service, in order to secure a pension at the Bureau of Pensions; otherwise the only relief that can be secured must be secured by a private act.

Mr. HARRISON. Under this bill what does the gentleman estimate the appropriation will have to be?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. At the very outside, not exceeding $2,500,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. The first year?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No. Gentlemen will note in reading from the report that that matter is set out clearly.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman inform me how many men who served in the Spanish-American War would be affected by this act?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. About 434,000, all told. That would include those in the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer uprising.

Mr. SABATH. It would include all of those?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; those serving between April 21, 1898, and the close of the war, July 4, 1902.

Mr. SABATH. And I understand the gentleman to say that all it would cost would be about $2,500,000?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes. This is a widows' bill.

Mr. SABATH. That will be about the first year?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No; that matter is all set out in the report. In about three years we figure the number of claims that would be adjudicated would run into $2,500,000.

Mr. SABATH. And the gentleman is under the impression that if this bill is passed it would eliminate a great many of these private pension bills?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. There is no question about that.

Mr. SABATH. That are introduced and brought into the House every few days?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. It would eliminate practically all of the special pension bills for widows.

Mr. SABATH. And it would take care of all of those who are deserving and in need and who are entitled to support?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Without bringing in a special bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That is it, exactly.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, that will include also any soldiers of the Regular Army who served in the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, or the Boxer uprising?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; if they served during that time—between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman mean to say that all soldiers of the Navy and Army who were enlisted previous to the time of the Spanish-American War, whether they served or whether they were located in Alaska, would be entitled to have their widows receive a pension under this act?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No; only those who were in those services.

Mr. TRIBBLE. How does the gentleman make the distinction? The bill makes no distinction. There is no distinction in the bill as to whether the man was in the service or not. Suppose the man was on the Arkansas, stationed in China, and he did not participate in this war at all, but was enlisted in the service?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. There were just a few of those soldiers—just a handful. It would be an exceedingly difficult matter to draw a bill to exclude that few number. Those men now who are in the regular establishment, if they can prove their disability is the result of service, are entitled to a pension under the general law.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I appreciate that, but now it is proposed to include the widows of all these soldiers who were in the service at that time. Let us take the Army, for instance. Only a part of the Army went to Cuba, but they were all enlisted at the time. Some of them might have been in Wyoming. Would the widows of those soldiers be entitled to pension under this bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Practically the entire Army at one time or other between those two dates was engaged in warfare either in Cuba or the Philippines or in the Boxer uprising—nearly all of them. There were a few stationed up around Alaska who were not engaged during the war, but outside of those a very small number.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Let us take the officers in the Army and Navy. The Government sends them to West Point or Annapolis. They enter for the purpose of serving the country in war both upon the land or the sea; that is what they enter for. They are paid in time of peace large salaries and held in reserve for war. Tell me why pension the man for service for which he has been paid year by year to render war service. Why should they be paid a pension the same as a man who enlisted from the State of South Carolina for the purpose of serving in the Spanish-American War as a volunteer, a man who left his farm or other occupation and gave voluntary service, with patriotic motives and not as a life profession? The Navy or Army officer follows his profession as a soldier. He is paid for it, and when war comes he is supposed to pay back to the Government by service.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I do not care to discuss that particular phase of the question.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am asking that question, and I think I am entitled to know.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I decline to answer; that is not material.

Mr. TRIBBLE. It is material; it is a material part of the bill, and I am perfectly willing to support a bill here that will pension the volunteer soldier and his widow.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think there is very little opposition to this bill on the floor of this House—I have found none—but I would like to ask the gentleman about this amendment. In the first section of the bill I desire to know just what is meant by the amendment in line 9, which reads as follows:

> Service to be computed from the date of enlistment to the date of discharge, including all furloughs.

What is the reason for the inclusion of that amendment, if I may have the attention of the gentleman.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The gentleman refers to the part in italics?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Well, those people were furloughed without their consent—that is, a large number of them were. Now, the War Department recognizes furloughs as part of the time of a soldier, and he is paid for the time he is furloughed, but that time is not computed at the Pension Department in the way of pensioning a soldier. These soldiers are subject to call while on this forced furlough; they are still under military control, and if they should leave without permission they would be court-martialed. In view of this fact I am of the opinion that the construing official of the Pension Bureau should recognize this time and it should be computed as part of his military service.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, there is even more than the furlough included in the amendment. It says:

The service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge.

Mr. HULINGS. If the gentleman will permit, I think the purpose of that amendment is to provide for the time they served. Under some regulation the time served abroad counts double; and to prevent any ambiguity or uncertainty about how the 90 days—I believe that is the limit—shall be counted, they count the date of enlistment to date of discharge.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the gentleman in charge of the bill and the committee, as I understand it, changed this bill by putting in a proviso which was not in the other bill which passed a year or two ago, to get around a decision of the Interior Department with reference to furloughed soldiers who, because of not counting the time they were furloughed, did not get a pensionable status by reason of not having served 90 days, because the time they were furloughed was taken away from them, and the men affected by this proviso were not furloughed in the ordinary sense of that term—they were sent home because there was nothing for them to do, subject, however, to the call of duty at any time. The decision to which I refer is in the well-known case of Joseph J. Peasley, where it was held—

Absence on furlough being incompatible with the rendition of such actual military service as is required by the acts of June 27, 1890, and February 6, 1907, the period so spent must be deducted in computing the length of military service rendered pensionable under said acts.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman have the figures as to what will be the effect of this amendment?

Mr. ANSBERRY. The Interior Department, or rather the report of the expert in the Bureau of Pensions, states that there are 98 officers and 3,315 enlisted men.

The number of claims filed by widows and dependents based upon service during the Spanish War and the Philippine insurrection is 14,614; and the number of widows and dependents who have been granted pensions on account of such service 7,122. The number of widows on the roll on account of the service above named on June 30, 1911, was 1,217, and the number of minor children 326. The number of widows' claims which have been rejected is 4,705. In the number rejected there are no doubt included many claims which have been rejected the second or third time upon the submission of additional evidence, so that the actual number of rejections would be somewhat less than that given.

From statistics gathered from various sources as to the average number of marriages each year and the ascertained death rates at certain ages it is estimated that the number of widows and minors who would probably be entitled to pension under this bill, should it be enacted into law, would be between 10,000 and 15,000. If the number should be as high as 15,000, the cost of the bill would be approximately $2,500,000 per annum within a few years after the passage thereof. It is evident, however, that the cost would increase from year to year for a number of years on account of the death of those who rendered service who would leave widows and minor children surviving who would be entitled to pension under the proposed act.

Mr. WILLIS. By the amendment?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Not 4,000, because many of the 4,000 were rejected in the Pension Bureau because they could not show the disability of the husband or father or son was due to service in the Army. They were rejected, and some of them were rejected more than once. I think some were rejected three or four times; so out of the 4,000 they probably got something about 3,000.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman thinks 3,000 would be included in the provision in reference to furloughs?

Mr. ANSBERRY. No. Somewhat more than that number would be affected by the furlough amendment or proviso.

Mr. WILLIS. What are the figures in regard to that?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Ninety-eight officers and 3,315 enlisted men——

Mr. WILLIS. How many?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Thirty-three hundred and fifteen enlisted men and 98 officers, or a total of 3,413, who enlisted in the summer of 1898 for the War with Spain were furloughed, not at their instance, but in spite of themselves; and, as I have stated before, were compelled to hold themselves in readiness subject to a call to return to the service.

Mr. WILLIS. This amendment saves them?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Exactly; and these soldiers were in a different class from the soldier who asked for a furlough for the purpose of going home. These men were furloughed in spite of themselves. They had no particular service to perform; so they were sent home pending the time their services might be needed.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I have yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee, and will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Have the Spanish War Veterans approved this bill?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I understand that the Spanish-American War Veterans have approved this bill, and not only the Spanish War Veterans, but it has been approved by the Grand Army of the Republic veterans of the Civil War. That is my understanding. Now I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I understand this bill, the mere fact that a man served a certain length of time——

Mr. ANSBERRY. Ninety days.

Mr. BARTLETT. Ninety days, and that his widow married him before this bill passed, or if he had a child 16 years old when he dies, without any proof connecting his death with the service, then the widow is entitled to a pension and the child is entitled to a pension, regardless of the cause of his death. He may be executed as a criminal or he may——

Mr. ANSBERRY. Oh, no.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, yes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Oh, yes; afterwards.

Mr. BARTLETT. No matter, if a man served 90 days, and he dies now from any cause, whether from violence or anything else, say natural causes or disease, the mere fact that she is a widow of a soldier who served 90 days in the war and has not $250 entitles her to a pension?

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is partially right. In other words, it puts the widows and dependent children, or other dependents, if they be parents, of Spanish-American War veterans on the same plane as the dependents of soldiers of every other war that we have ever had in this country. In no case do children, unless insane or helpless invalids, get a pension after they are 16.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do they not have to prove a service-origin disease when a soldier dies when they apply for a pension?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Not any more, except in the case of a Spanish-War veteran's widow, and that is what this bill seeks to remedy. Of course it is possible to get a pension or an increase of pension under the old law, and then, of course, the question is as to whether the disability is of service origin.

Mr. WILLIS. I think the gentleman has overstated the matter just a little. This does not simply put the Spanish-American War widows on the same basis as the widows of Civil War veterans, but there is an additional restriction.

Mr. ANSBERRY. In other words, they must prove that they are dependents. I thank my colleague for the suggestion.

Mr. BUTLER. And is not that the only distinction between the status of a Spanish-American War widow and the widow of a soldier of the Civil War?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. BUTLER. A $250 limit?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes. Other than that they will have the same status as the widows or dependents of every other soldier of every other war that we ever engaged in.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman knows I am entirely friendly to the bill. I wanted to know what the reason was for the amendment in lines 6 and 7, where the words "during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection" are supposed to be stricken out, and in place thereof certain other language inserted.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I suppose that was for the reason that the committee wanted to include the widows and dependents of the soldiers who were killed in the Boxer rebellion in China also, and this service is not described in the language just read, and which was stricken out and the necessary proviso included to accomplish this object.

Mr. WILLIS. Has the gentleman any indication of the number included in that?

Mr. ANSBERRY. No; not exactly. Of course, necessarily there were not very many.

Mr. LANGLEY. The number was comparatively small.

Mr. BUTLER. The Boxer insurrection was in the summer of 1900.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman is usually correct, and I think he is in this instance.

Mr. BUTLER. It comes within the provisions of the bill?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; within the time limitations in the bill.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in opposition to this measure.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman can get time.

Mr. DIES. I thought you had yielded the floor.

Mr. ANSBERRY. No; I have not. I want to yield the floor for two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], and then I will yield to him.

Mr. DIES. I am not asking the gentleman from Ohio for time.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman is very fortunate in not asking me, because I do not believe I would give it to him.

Mr. DIES. I do not think he has a right to give it to anybody. When he gets through with the floor I will demand recognition in my own right.

Mr. ANSBERRY. As to my right to yield of my time, the gentleman is mistaken. The reason I do this is because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] advised me he had to leave, and wanted to speak for two or three minutes. That is the only reason.

Mr. DIES. With the understanding that I may have the floor at the end of two minutes——

Mr. ANSBERRY. At the end of two minutes. I want to proceed, and will proceed until the hour is exhausted.

Mr. DIES. When the gentleman from Massachusetts yields the floor I want the floor in my own right.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] for a question, and in that way he can get the time he desires.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Ohio agree with me that the committee is to be congratulated? I am sure that he does.

I am glad that the Committee on Pensions has brought this bill before us in season. At last there seems to be a good prospect that it will become a law before the Sixty-third Congress expires next March. Owing to our dilatoriness in the last Congress we have been the occasion of a good deal of unnecessary privation in the case of many Spanish War widows. I am sorry that the committee retained the clause in the bill which forbids a Spanish War widow her pension if she has an income of more than $250 per year outside of what she may earn. Many a good woman of my age has no earning capacity at all, and yet, if she has an income of over 69 cents per day, she is not pensionable under this bill. Personally, I believe that $365 would be a much better figure than $250 for the limit of income. Unless a war widow has resources of more than a dollar a day outside of what she may earn, I think she ought to get a pension. In fact, at heart I am not sure that it is right to discriminate at all between soldiers' widows, rich or poor.

However, no cheeseparing spirit animated the committee in providing this $250 limit. I realize as well as anyone that men in charge of a bill are more afraid of a sidetrack than of anything else. It may be true that this bill would be side-tracked in the Senate if it carried too big an expenditure. Possibly the chairman may decide that he can permit an increase of the income limit to $365 without endangering this bill. At all events, I hope so.

Now, just a word to those gentlemen who say that we Congressmen are catering for the votes of "bloodless heroes." The Spanish War was very real to us who took part, even if it seemed a pleasing diversion to those who read their newspapers in the shirt-sleeved ease of the hammock. Most soldiers of the Spanish War, it is true, did not have the chance to hear the hum of a hostile bullet; yet how few escaped the close contact of the pestilential camp. Is there one of us who did not stand face to face with his own descent into the valley of the shadow of death? Is there one of us to whom it was not a daily pain to watch a comrade borne to his last long home? Heroes we never pretended to be, nor will our widows be heroines. We are plain men who have given our countrymen an overflowing measure; that is all. If our countrymen will give our widows a modest pittance after we are gone we shall feel that the Nation is not forgetful of the unstinted gift which we showed our readiness to bestow.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that with the committee and all interested in pension legislation, that in carrying out the well-known policy of the country, they are to be congratulated upon the fact that the Members of this House have at last awakened to the cry of the widows of these men who, going out as mere boys some fourteen or fifteen years ago, accomplished the things we set out to do, and, unfortunately, a good deal more; because in a measure, I think, we violated the agreement which we made with the world that it was not a war of aggression; that it was not a war in which we sought to increase our real-estate holdings, either on this continent or on any other. I assume that, at the time when our statement of policy was declared to the world in reference to this war, we did not intend that statement to mean any more than that we would not take Cuba, because we did not foresee that which happened; and we took possession of the Philippine Islands as a necessary consequence, as it afterwards turned out, of that unfortunate part of our history.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. For a question; yes.

Mr. GORDON. Why do you say we took the Philippine Islands as a necessary consequence? We bought them, and paid $20,000,000 for them.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Perhaps the gentleman is right. Then we have a double title to them—one by conquest and one by purchase.

Mr. MURDOCK. And that makes a better reason why we should never give them up.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I have not read the bill very thoroughly nor the report, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] seems to be very familiar with this question. If I understand the provisions of the bill, it limits the right to a pension for a widow of a soldier of either one of these wars to a service of 90 days?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Oh, yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, does it make any provision for allowing a pension where the service is less than 90 days, in case the soldier was prohibited from serving a longer time because of injury?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Oh, well, the general pension legislation now on the statute books takes care of that.

Mr. FOWLER. Does it in reality take care of this class of cases?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Absolutely. There is no doubt about it in the world.

Mr. FOWLER. I have some doubt about it. That is the reason I am asking the gentleman the question.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I assure the gentleman his doubts should be dispelled, because there is not any question about it.

Mr. SABATH. Does the Pension Department always agree with the gentleman from Ohio and rule accordingly?

Mr. ANSBERRY. No. If the Pension Department agreed with me always, every soldier in my district would be on the pension roll when he arrived at a certain age at a rate of more than $1 a day. The department, unfortunately for my constituents who are veterans, does not agree with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. No doubt my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has had some experience along that line, and that accounts for the fact that he propounds his question in the way he does.

Mr. ANSBERRY. In the event a soldier is shot out of the service, as we term it, having served 30 days or 3 days or 1 day, and goes out of the service as the result of sickness or injury received in the service, but did not have 90 days' service, and dies, there is no possible question about his widow, under existing law, getting a pension of $12 a month.

Mr. FOWLER. I think that is true. But that applies to other classes than the widows of soldiers who served in the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection?

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman is correct in that. The only relief that a soldier's wife in the Regular Army could get would be by special pension legislation, except for the general pension legislation now on the statute books. I think that is right. I would not be absolutely certain of that position, however.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman think that provision of the statute would be extended to the widows of soldiers of the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection?

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is now the present status of the pension law. They are covered by it, beyond question.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not find it that way.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I wish the gentleman would give me a concrete case. Did the gentleman have a case of that kind where he could not get a pension for a soldier's widow?

Mr. DIXON. Does the gentleman mean that if a soldier lost an arm in the service and died of typhoid fever after the war was over his widow could get a pension?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I did not say that. I thought the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] spoke of a case where a man was shot out of the service without having served 90 days in the Army. In a case of that kind I maintain that under this bill that man's widow would get $12 per month.

Mr. FOWLER. Without making proof of the cause of his death?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Absolutely. That is what this bill is for.

Mr. DYER. Not unless he served 90 days.

Mr. ANSBERRY. He is put in the same category with the man who served 90 days. Is not that the understanding of the gentleman from Indiana on that?

Mr. DIXON. I think he should be, of course, but I doubt that this bill as presented has that effect.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under the law the widow of a Spanish-American War veteran may be pensioned if the soldier has died of injuries or disease incurred in the service. Is that correct?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; under the existing law.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I want to know. Now, under this bill the widow of a Spanish-American veteran may be pensioned at $12 a month, regardless of whether the husband died in consequence of injuries received in the service or not, provided she is dependent. Is that correct?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Absolutely.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the matter of dependency is determined by the limit of income, which is fixed at $250 a year?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; if she does not receive more than $250 a year.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman said, as I understood him a few moments ago, that the widows of all the veterans of the Civil War were taken care of. I wish we had a bill that would reach this class of cases; that is, to pension widows who were married to veterans after the year 1890. That is not affected by this bill, is it?

Mr. ANSBERRY. No.

Mr. MURDOCK. That would come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes. I assume that this bill will be amended in the Senate, as a similar bill—the so-called Crago bill—was amended in the Senate in the Sixty-second Congress. As I understand it, the Committee on Pensions in the Senate has jurisdiction over all pension legislation, and therefore they could with propriety put on an amendment to this bill that would have the effect that the gentleman desires.

Mr. MURDOCK. I hope so.

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is to say, we would move the date down to about three years ago.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman think that ought to go as a separate proposition? It is a meritorious one, in my judgment.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I do not think it is essential that it should be considered as a separate proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not mean that if that provision went on in the Senate and it got through he would be opposed to it?

Mr. DYER. No; but I think it ought to go as a separate proposition. But I do not like this idea of riders being placed on appropriation bills.

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is partially correct. But this could not be considered as a rider. Pension legislation, whether it be for the widows of the Civil War or widows of the Spanish-American War, or any other war, is so nearly akin that there is not any reason why that amendment should not be made. The gentleman's proposition would be correct if this were an appropriation bill. But it is not; it is a general pension bill.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to ask him a question on the merits of the bill.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. DYER. In his experience has the gentleman had a great number of cases of widows seeking pensions as widows of Spanish-American War soldiers where the line of demarcation was closely drawn or almost obliterated? In other words, has he had cases of widows whose husbands died of disabilities which no doubt were contracted in the service, but which could not be technically proved, and where under the rules pensions could not be granted?

Mr. ANSBERRY. That has been my experience.

Mr. DYER. That is one of the things this bill is for—to take care of meritorious cases, is it not?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because it anticipates in a measure what we shall hear shortly from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], who has repeatedly on this floor, in discussing special pension legislation, picked out the case of a blind man who was getting $30 a month and placed that in a deadly parallel with another blind soldier who was receiving $50 a month, and then asked the question, in the way that only the distinguished gentleman from Texas can ask it, "Why is it that both of these soldiers are not treated alike?"

Now, the gentleman went to the root of the subject in his question, so far as this bill is to meet the demands of many Spanish War widows affected. No doubt every man who has tried to help some poor woman, the widow of a Spanish War soldier, or the dependent mother of a Spanish War soldier, has had the same experience that I have had. If that soldier boy died from some disease that medical science has not been able to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau was an after effect of typhoid (or malarial) fever contracted in the service, from which so many of those poor boys suffered, the Pension Bureau has adopted a hard and fast rule, and turns down that widow or that mother because of the inability of medical men to demonstrate the relationship of the fever and the disease from which the soldier died. So all of us who have had those cases on our hands have appealed to the Pension Committee for relief, but in my experience of nearly eight years in this House I have succeeded in getting just one special bill through for the relief of one widow so situated. For the benefit of some of these gentlemen who think and assert that all you have to do in order to get a pension is to file an application and establish the fact that the father or brother or some distant relative served somewhere for 90 days, I will say that I have had a great deal of trouble in getting pensions for Spanish War veterans and their dependents in the Pension Bureau, but I have had a great deal harder work to get relief through the Pension Committee, and because of the fact that mine is a common experience for all of us this committee is bringing in this general legislation.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The trouble with you was that you did not have any proof, was it not?

Mr. ANSBERRY. No. My colleague is mistaken. I had all the proof obtainable.

Mr. GORDON. The law provides that every person who was injured or incurred disease in the Civil War is entitled to a pension.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is sometimes very hard to prove.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; but I have tried to explain to the gentleman that because of the strictness of that rule and because of the barrenness of medical testimony to connect up the condition of some poor fellow who is a sufferer from some trouble that undoubtedly was the aftermath of typhoid or malarial fever and could not, as I say, prove the connection, it is very difficult to get pensions. We all know from experience that typhoid fever is very disastrous in its results, and many of these boys who suffered from typhoid fever died two or three years after they had apparently recovered; and when it was sought to prove that they died from the effects of disease contracted in the service—that is, from typhoid or malarial fever, and that perhaps was the case with most of them—the department turned them down because they could not establish the relationship between the disease from which they died, in the very flower of their youth, and the disease contracted in the service. I have mentioned typhoid and malarial fever because those are the kinds of cases which I have failed to establish and which were the most numerous to which my attention was directed.

Mr. GORDON. Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that ordinarily there are no aftereffects from typhoid fever?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, yes; there are.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I know that the aftereffects of typhoid fever are as bad as those of almost any disease that can be mentioned.

Mr. GORDON. Why, I have had typhoid fever.

Mr. LANGLEY. And I think the gentleman shows the effects of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. With all due respect to the gentleman, permit me to say that I think he is the exception which proves the rule.

Mr. GORDON. You do not claim that there is any medical authority for the statement that typhoid fever has any aftereffects, do you?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; there is.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Unfortunately medicine is not an exact science. We have not reached that certainty in medicine that we have in surgery as to cause and effect, but there is an overwhelming weight of evidence, the result of actual experience, that malarial fever, typhoid fever, and diseases of that character are more deadly in their aftereffects than almost any other disease, and it is doubtless due to the prevalence of these fevers which caused these boys to apply for pensions; but because of the difficulty of connecting the aftereffects with the disease the Pension Bureau refuses their widows a pension.

Mr. MURDOCK. I hope the gentleman will not leave that question in any doubt.

Mr. GORDON. If there are any doctors here who know anything about this question, I should like to hear from them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. When men have had some first-hand contact with the disease, and when they have seen the effect of that disease upon their comrades, they do not have to call in a doctor to justify their own eyesight.

Mr. GORDON. Doctors ordinarily are the best authority upon questions of disease and the effects of disease.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; but I may answer the gentleman by the application of an old story. One man may see another man scratching his head, but he can not tell where it itches. [Laughter.] You do not have to call in second-hand evidence to prove that sort of thing. When a man was in such a splendid physical condition that he was marked A1 and passed into the service of the United States, and after a run of typhoid fever, complicated, as in most instances it was, with malaria, and that man comes out a physical wreck, he does not have to ask a doctor to testify as to his condition, does he?

Mr. GORDON. Does not the Army surgeon make a record of a man's physical condition when he is discharged?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The surgeon who is on duty at the muster out makes a record of his outward physical condition.

Mr. GORDON. Outward?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Outward physical condition. If the man has any inward difficulty the surgeon does not diagnose it or make a record of it.

Mr. GORDON. Does he not make a record of that, also?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He does not examine him for that.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio, I desire to state that I served——

Mr. GORDON. Are you a doctor?

Mr. LANGLEY. I am a lawyer; but I am almost a doctor, too, because of my long pension experience. I served for nearly 10 years as an examiner in the Pension Office and as a member of the Board of Pension Appeals, and my observation there was that typhoid fever was one of the most frequent causes of permanent disability. I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that there came under my personal observation during that period of service hundreds and hundreds of cases in which pensionable disability was admitted as a result of typhoid fever, and there were many other cases where the question was a very close one as to whether they had established the pathological connection. [Applause.] In a good many cases that were rejected I am satisfied that such pathological connection existed, but the soldier was unable, for some cause, to make the necessary proof.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Ohio. I will say that I was examined before I went into the service in 1898.

Mr. MOORE. Was the gentleman in the service?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I was. [Applause.] I was given a good, thorough physical examination. I was also rated as being examined when I left the service, and I will say——

Mr. GORDON. Were you examined then?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I was not, and there was not a member of my company who was examined.

Mr. GORDON. The law requires it, does it not?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I have nothing to say about what the law requires. I am simply telling you the facts.

Mr. GORDON. If you had any disability and intended to apply for a pension you would have been examined.

Mr. ANSBERRY. But they did not go into the war for the purpose of applying for pensions, and their acceptance of their discharges which in many instances inaccurately, against their interests, described their physical condition is sufficient to prove my contention.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will allow me, the personal element has been introduced here. I did not intend to allude to it. I was in the service in 1898 myself. I was almost given up for death with typhoid fever at one time. I did not receive any medical examination when I was mustered out. I was mustered out flat on my bed without any medical examination.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further.

Mr. GORDON. I hope the gentleman will yield to me. They are directing their remarks to me, and I want to ask a question.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I hope the gentleman will allow me to answer the gentleman's question, if I may.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Very well; I will yield.

Mr. GORDON. The question I wanted to ask was of the gentleman from Vermont, if he is suffering any disease as the result of the typhoid fever?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am.

Mr. GORDON. Is the gentleman drawing a pension?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am.

Mr. GORDON. As the result of typhoid fever?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes. The gentleman introduced this personal matter; I was not intending to refer to it. But when a man testifies to what he saw and a part of which he was, he comes pretty near being something like the old "classical" authority in some things. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Yes; but the matter we were discussing was the medical question.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. CLINE. I want to get back to the bill. I presume that the committee in drafting this bill intended to grant pensions only to widows and minor children.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. And dependent parents are not included?

Mr. ANSBERRY. No.

Mr. CLINE. What good reason is there for excluding dependent parents?

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman understands the difference between a widow and a dependent father and mother. Possibly under the existing law if the son of this dependent father or mother died as a result of injury received in the service, or sickness, the dependent father and mother would be taken care of. If not, no difficulty would be experienced by special legislation.

Mr. CLINE. Yes; but there are other meritorious cases.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I think there are other meritorious cases, but I presume in drawing the bill the committee wanted to do it as broadly as possible, and still draw one that they would be able to get through.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. How large a pension list is the result of the Spanish-American War?

Mr. ANSBERRY. About $7,000,000 a year, as I am informed by a member of the committee, and it is estimated that there will be $2,500,000 more after they are all adjudicated.

Mr. BARTLETT. Making $10,000,000 more.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Ten million dollars in all.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not likely that the roll will increase?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; it will increase, of course. There will be a natural increase, the result of men who participated in the conflict dying and increasing the number of widows who will apply for a pension.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has there been any estimate made by the Pension Bureau or the Commissioner of Pensions as to what the probable increase will be for the next four or five years?

Mr. ANSBERRY. No. From the very nature of things they could not do that.

Mr. BARTLETT. We had an estimate made and submitted two years ago under the Sherwood bill.

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is another story.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was greatly underestimated. They estimated it at $20,000,000, and afterwards we had to make up a deficiency of $15,000,000, and then appropriate $35,000,000 in addition in the regular pension appropriation bill.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I want to say that the gentleman from Georgia must recognize the difference in estimating how many widows there will be of the soldiers actually engaged in the Spanish War and the war in the Philippines and the death of old men who would be affected by the Sherwood bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I understand the difficulty.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. And you do not know how many widows are going to marry again.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I desire to call attention to two features of the bill that have not been mentioned and perhaps not observed. First, it provides that the widow of an officer shall not receive any more compensation under this act than that of an enlisted man. In the second place, it provides that no one marrying one of these men after the passage of this act shall be entitled to a pension. Hence we need not fear that the increase will amount to very much in the end.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will yield to the gentleman from New York, a distinguished soldier of the Civil War.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have been reading the bill and the report accompanying it very carefully, and being one of the "old boys" of the Civil War, one of three left in this House, and more or less familiar with the subject, I want to state that the provision placing the annual net income of the widow at $250 is a wise one. We had that provision for 40 years after the Civil War. Another thing, I notice by the report that out of 15,000 applications—and I am astonished that there were not more—the Bureau of Pensions have allowed one half and the other half have been rejected, abandoned, or are pending. I do not anticipate that this is going to increase the pension roll very much, and it will relieve Members of Congress from having to introduce special bills for deserving cases arising from the Spanish War, the Philippine insurrection, and the regular organization. Therefore, I am heartily in favor of the bill and hope that it will pass.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I welcome the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, who rendered such distinguished services in the late Civil War and who is still rendering such service to the country in the capacity of a legislator.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] stated that the estimates made by the Invalid Pensions Committee at the time of the Sherwood bill had been exceeded by $35,000,000. The gentleman is mistaken, because the total pension bill was not increased that amount.

Mr. BARTLETT. We appropriated $15,000,000 in the deficiency bill, and then, if the Sherwood bill had not been enacted, we would have appropriated $150,000,000, whereas we did appropriate $180,000,000.

Mr. ANSBERRY. It was not due to that, because the total annual amount carried under the Sherwood bill, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] stated on the floor within the past 90 days, was something over $20,000,000, and that his estimate was approximately the right amount.

Mr. LANGLEY. That was my understanding.

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not help what the understanding of the gentleman from Kentucky is; I put in the RECORD the statement of the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am referring to the annual increase of the amount paid to Civil War soldiers under the Sherwood law and not to the total additional amount paid on account of all pensions since the passage of that law.

Mr. BARTLETT. By reason of the passage of the Sherwood bill we were compelled to appropriate $15,000,000 in a deficiency bill, and then when the regular pension appropriation bill came on at the next session, instead of appropriating $150,000,000 we had to appropriate $180,000,000.

Mr. LANGLEY. These two amounts the gentleman mentions were not for the same year. The gentleman's statement is unintentionally misleading.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman that as a member of the Committee on Appropriations he well knows that there is something over $5,000,000 of a surplus of that money which he is now talking about having been appropriated.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is a surplus of nearly $6,000,000; but as long as I have been asked the question I would like to say this. The gentleman was asking with reference to the surplus. There is an estimated surplus of some $5,700,000; but the commissioner, in his testimony before the committee some time ago in the hearings upon the appropriation bill, said that he probably would have a surplus of $500,000, and for that reason we have not reappropriated the $6,700,000 in the bill which we will report here in a few days.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the provision in lines 2, 3, and 4, on page 2, by which a widow is to receive a pension only in case she is able to show that her income is less than $250 per year. It would seem to me that widows of soldiers of the Spanish War ought to be put upon the same basis as widows of soldiers of the Civil War. And I wish to say that my experience in the Pension Bureau with cases arising under the act known as the remarried widows' act, which contains a provision of this kind, is that it causes more trouble and more annoyance than any other feature of any law that I know of.

It seems to me that for the reasons I suggest the widows of the Spanish War soldiers ought to be put upon the same basis as the widows of the Civil War soldiers, and on account of the difficulties of arriving at the income and the trouble and annoyance of it those lines ought to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan, as to the provisions to which he objects, that I do not believe any Member of this House who indorses the pension policy of the Government will take a different view than does the gentleman from Michigan, generally speaking. There is no question that it is a great inconvenience, and it causes a good deal of difficulty. It is a source of some expense to the Pension Bureau, as well, to ascertain just what the income of a widow is whose income is in the vicinity of $250 a year. There is no question about that, but in previous pension legislation, notably that of the Civil War on widows' pensions, for 40 years the same provision was in the law. It was taken out, not for the reason the gentleman urges, although I concede that is a strong reason, but as a matter of policy, out of the generosity of this Government, in order that no impediment might be put in the way of a widow of one of those grand old heroes. That is the position of the committee and the position of this House, as reflected by the debates whenever this question has been brought up, and it has been discussed many times in my service and in the service of the gentleman who has propounded the question. It has been said that while we want to be as generous as we can with the widows and dependents of the veterans of any war, still we must recognize that there are limits beyond which we should not go; and I submit to the gentleman, in all fairness, that any woman who is the widow of a Spanish War veteran is in a far different position in point of age and ability to get out and earn a living than is the widow of a soldier of the Civil War; and, therefore, if a young woman, a widow of a Spanish War veteran, has an income of $250 a year I submit we should not give her a pension at this time.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, much that the gentleman says supports my contention. The experience of the department and of all who did business under the old law shows that those words were unfortunate. They were troublesome and unjust and were stricken from that law. Why should we not profit by our experience under that law? As to the attitude of the department, as I have seen it, toward the Spanish War soldier, while I do not wish to criticize the department severely, it seems to me they have not been entirely fair and they are not as kindly disposed toward soldiers and widows of soldiers of the Spanish War as they ought to be. Many of the officials and examiners of the Pension Bureau are veterans of the Civil War, and they look upon the Spanish War simply as a skirmish, and they are disposed, it seems to me, to ridicule the claims of Spanish War soldiers. What will be the experience under this very provision? It will be found that a widow has a little home, a very humble affair, which she is occupying with her children. The department demands to know what the annual rental value of the property is, and charges it up against her, and it is calculated as a part of the income, and by such calculation, including items of that kind, if the income is found to reach $250, the widow will be denied a pension. For all the reasons I have stated and based on what the gentleman himself says, the unfortunate experience of the department and of those who did business with it under the old law, I submit the elimination of those words in that law ought to lead to the elimination of them in this law.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to my friend from Michigan, I want to make this suggestion, that the number of widows of Spanish veterans who have made applications for pensions under the existing law—and I assume that nearly all of them who were widows and who had the shadow of a claim made such application, because that is the experience of the department—was very small, as compared with the total number of widows of the veterans of the Civil War. For that reason, although they had a great deal of difficulty in establishing the amount of income of the widow, still they would not have anywhere near as much difficulty in establishing that in the case of the widows of Spanish War soldiers, for the reason that they are so few in number. Therefore, for the reasons which I have stated before, I think the position of the committee ought to be sustained, more particularly because these women in point of age are far better equipped to go out and make a living for themselves than are the women whose average age would be beyond 60. If they have an income of $250 a year, even though it should be reckoned in the way the gentleman suggests, I think they should be exempted from claiming a pension under this law.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Recognizing the fact that the gentleman has devoted a great deal of time and study to this question I would not desire to offer an amendment which may not be agreeable to the committee, but nevertheless I desire to ask whether the committee would not agree to amend so that it would embody in this bill also the parents of such soldiers? And I had thought in view of the fact that the gentleman himself has plead for the old widows, and we know the majority of the widows of these Spanish-American soldiers are young women, where in all cases, of course, the mothers of those unfortunate boys and soldiers are old and many of them are dependent—I have tried frequently to secure a pension in many of those cases for a dependent mother or father, but unfortunately I have failed—I believe that in a great many instances the parents of these boys are entitled to the same consideration as a widow who has married such a soldier after the war was over and after he has perhaps been afflicted with disease or misfortune and has contracted an ailment from which he can not recover.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I agree with the gentleman in the main, and the sentiments he expresses does him proud, but of course you can not take care of everyone who should possibly have a pension at this time.

Mr. SABATH. Well, does not the gentleman think that justice demands that we should treat the mothers of these boys in the same way as we do the widows of these soldiers?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will say to the gentleman that the soldiers themselves and those interested in procuring this legislation have not taken the advanced position my friend has. They are not asking this. I believe they are right in not asking this at this time, although my sympathy goes out to the people to whom the gentleman refers. As I said before, you must put a limit somewhere and it happens to shut these people out. That amendment might perhaps defeat the bill.

Mr. SABATH. So the reason the gentleman gives is that he expects he can get the bill through now, but if it should be amended there would be danger of the bill passing?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Exactly; in view of the attitude of some gentlemen on pension legislation. Now, I congratulate the House on the fact that the number that will be affected by this bill is the largest number that is consistent with putting pension legislation on the statute books.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I ask the gentleman if he will accept——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I just ask for one minute in view of the fact I referred to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I might proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The question I desire to ask the gentleman is if he will accept an amendment to the bill, then the most serious objection to the bill will in part be removed. The amendment I propose is to strike out, page 1, in line 6, the words "regular or," and leave it so as to read:

Enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States as a volunteer.

I will support your bill with this amendment proposed and certain other amendments I shall propose.

Mr. ANSBERRY. No; that is not fair to the regular soldier. It is not fair to the widow of the man who entered the service by way of the Regular Army and who was called into action with the Volunteers, so called, taken care of in this bill. Any man who entered the service of the Federal Government as a soldier, and particularly those Regulars who entered between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, went in the same service as did these Volunteers who are being taken care of. Why discriminate against the widow of a soldier because perchance he enlisted a few days before war was declared between this country and Spain and went in the Regular department of the Army instead of the Volunteer?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Make it three months before and I will support it.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Practically every man in the Regular Army was called to go to the Boxer uprising in China, the Philippines, Cuba, or to some of the camps in the part of this country where they contracted these malarial fevers, typhoid fever, and diseases the aftermath of which so affected their general health and impaired them, by reason of which they applied for pensions and were rejected.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will ask the gentleman this, if it is not true that these enlisted officers who have been educated at the Naval Academy and at West Point, when they entered the service and were placed on the pay roll of the Government, did so with the understanding that they be supported in time of peace and, in return, fight in time of war? They are supported sumptuously in time of peace for the reason that they are to fight our battles in time of war. That is the reason large salaries are paid them; that is the reason the United States Government gives $18,000 each to put them through West Point and the Naval Academy. When the Spanish-American War came on they were expected to perform the duty for which they had been educated, for which the Government had paid, and I repeat, why should they be put on the pension rolls? They were called upon to render service for which they had been paid. The volunteer soldier is different.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will say to the gentleman this: As my colleague, a veteran of the Civil War, so well suggested, all soldiers are volunteers. The mere fact that he is a regular does not detract from the fact that he walked in and signed the roll to defend his country, and you can put in that category those soldiers who fought in that war. For that reason, while I would welcome the gentleman to support this bill, knowing his attitude on pension legislation as I do, familiar as I am and have been with his attitude, I might say the bitter opposition which he has manifested upon the floor in opposing the pensions which we grant in the form of special pensions and his opposition to the Sherwood bill, manifesting an unalterable opposition to all legislation of that character, quite naturally I would make many sacrifices to awaken in his breast that latent spark of patriotism which would follow his support of this bill.

But I can not follow the gentleman's suggestion even to obtain such a desired consummation.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; I will be glad to yield.

Mr. HULINGS. In lines 14 and 15, on page 2, it says:

Such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16.

Now, just what does that comprehend?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I assume that comprehends the regular pension of $2 a month which is now granted to the children of soldiers who die as a result of injuries contracted in the service and which children have not reached the age of 16 years.

Mr. HULINGS. I understand. Is it a pension of a widow or mother who has died or is it $2 a month to the children?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Two dollars a month additional for each child under 16 years of age, as the present pension legislation provides.

Mr. HULINGS. The language in the bill does not say so.

Mr. WILLIS. It means the same as the present law?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I have no sort of delusion about this matter. I do not want to be mistaken for anything that is bad, and I particularly do not want to be mistaken for a man who is half-witted or of small intelligence. I understand perfectly well you can label any kind of legislation as pension legislation and pass it through this House. That has been demonstrated over and over again. As I stated here on a former occasion, we gave a pension to a man who was a boy when the war was in progress and whose only service consisted of holding a Confederate soldier's horse. Just a few weeks ago we gave a pension to a man who rendered some sort of service, for 4 months and 20 days, way back before the Civil War, but the service was not for the United States Government. He was paid for the service by the State of California, which State, in turn, received payment from the Federal Government 54 years ago.

Now, 13 years after that man did that 4 months and 20 days' service he got married, and 54 years after he performed the 4 months and 20 days' service, and after his death, you, my colleagues, in your magnanimous prodigality in dealing with other people's money, gave the widow a pension for a service which her husband had rendered 54 years before, and for which he had been paid by the State of California, never having had any connection with the service of the Government of the United States. Of course, if you would give that sort of a pension in that kind of a case, why should you not pass this pension bill? Why should you not pass any pension bill? I can show you a precedent for any sort of a pension bill you have in mind to offer in this House.

Now, I am occupying this hour largely for my own gratification, and I must confess to a kind of feeling that maybe it will give displeasure to some of these gentlemen who are liberal with the people's money. You know, I always love a liberal man. I like to see a man who will spend his money. I hate to see a miser. But whatever credit I have given to people heretofore for liberality I have never extended to a man who was liberal with other people's money.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DIES. With pleasure.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Does that same rule apply in regard to the digging of canals and improving rivers in the gentleman's district?

Mr. DIES. Oh, yes; absolutely. And my friend there, magnificent Representative that he is, is fair and liberal with his own money, and he is a perfect prodigal son when it comes to Uncle Sam's money. [Laughter.] Indeed, if all of us were as liberal with the people's money as my friend from Ohio, your Uncle Samuel would want a pension himself pretty soon.

Mr. FOWLER. Would he get it?

Mr. DIES. He would get it if he would come to this Congress and ask for it, of course. I believe it is true that no pension bill has ever failed of passage in the American Congress.

At least, I do not know of any. I do not believe if a man introduced a pension bill and got it on the floor of the House that these magnificently liberal gentlemen would allow him to withdraw it, if he wanted to do so.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow a correction?

Mr. DIES. Certainly.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I can assure the gentleman that the Sulloway bill did not pass Congress.

Mr. DIES. Well, the Sherwood bill did, and that certainly went far enough.

Mr. LANGLEY. So that the gentleman's statement will not mislead anybody, I desire to call attention to the fact that a bill which has been favorably reported two or three times to this House, and which is pending now, pensioning those State militiamen who aided in the suppression of the rebellion, but were never regularly mustered, has not been passed, although the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] and I have for years been begging and pleading that it be passed.

Mr. DIES. Oh, it will pass. The time will come when it will pass, as all these pension bills do.

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope and pray that it will.

Mr. DIES. If they put on a uniform, or even if they borrowed a brother's uniform, they will be pensioned. You have done very well. You have spent forty-five hundred millions of the people's money on pensions since the Civil War was over. You have given them to every man who ever served in the war; you have given them to almost all their kinspeople; and you have given them to men who never servd a day in the war in their lives. And you will give them to the militiamen.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Do you say seriously that this Government has voted a pension to all the kinsfolk and soldiers who fought in any war? Does the gentleman mean that?

Mr. DIES. I do not know how many kinsfolk have been taken in and pensioned, but you are making rapid progress along that line.

Mr. ANSBERRY. But the gentleman made the statement distinctly that we have granted pensions to nearly all the kinsfolk of soldiers who fought in the Civil War. Can the gentleman maintain that is true?

Mr. DIES. I can not maintain anything as long as the gentleman from Ohio is taking up my time.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Answer the question, yes or no.

Mr. DIES. Oh, yes and no——

Mr. ANSBERRY. It is a very simple statement. Will the gentleman answer?

Mr. DIES. If the gentleman will take his seat, I will answer.

Mr. ANSBERRY. You decline to answer?

Mr. DIES. Let us see. A few days ago you gave a pension to a man who was 72 years old, but who was 22 years old when the war began, whose father went into the war while he lived, and you gave it to the mother until her death, and you gave it to that old man who you said was a dependent and a helpless child of the soldier.

Mr. ANSBERRY. And was a dependent and helpless child at the time of his father's death. Is not that true? Should LOT that be stated?

Mr. DIES. He was no child at all at the time you gave him a pension, unless you can say that in this country a man of 72 years of age is a child.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I did not make that statement. I said that at the time of his father's death he was a dependent child. That has been the policy of the Government heretofore.

Mr. DIES. I am not disputing about the policy of the Government. But I yielded to my friend for a question, not for a speech. I love to hear him make a speech, but I would prefer to have him make his speech in his own time.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman complains that we have been pensioning persons who were not in the service of the United States. The Texas Rangers were not in the service of the United States, but they have been given a pensionable status by act of Congress. Does the gentleman disapprove of that legislation?

Mr. DIES. Oh, I do not approve of any kind of pensions except such as are based upon disabilities arising from service. I would be willing to give a pension to those who served the country in time of actual war; those who were injured in the service of their country; and I would like to have the pension roll as a roll of honor, that a man might point to with pride in the years to come, where mention on that roll would mean that the man was an honorable soldier. But you have made it a roll of dishonor and of graft by placing on it the names of those who rendered no service to the flag. The time will come when, instead of being a badge of honor, your pension roll will be a badge of disgrace. That is the exact truth, if you want to know what it is.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman is entitled, of course, to his opinion, but I do not think there are very many in this body, and certainly none on this side, who agree with his statement that the pension roll has been made one of dishonor and disgrace, and I challenge that statement in the name of the soldiers of the country.

Mr. DIES. Yes; my friend challenges that statement. He may get 40 or 50 votes in his district for challenging it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, I will say to the gentleman that I was not thinking of that, for I have all the votes I need already. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIES. Oh, a man does not have all the votes he needs. When a man gets all the money he needs he goes on accumulating more for a rainy day, as he says; and when a man has all the votes he thinks he needs he still goes on getting more to lay by, as it were, for a rainy day, when he is not so popular as he is now. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I regret to say to the gentleman that he is not very popular just now in my district. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIES. I am not surprised at that. I am popular, however, with every man who has a scar on his body, received in the defense of his country's flag. I am not popular with the men who get pensions without having rendered any service for them, because I have called attention to the injustice of taxing the people of this country to pay pensions of that sort.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman has just stated that my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] would get 40 or 50 votes on account of the remarks he has made just now. I would like to inquire what effect the speech of the gentleman from Texas will have on him and his political fortunes?

Mr. DIES. It will do me good, and no harm at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Then the gentleman may infer that we are trying to benefit him by these interruptions, helping him manufacture material for home consumption. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIES. Oh, no. My people are just as much opposed to this sort of fraud as I am, and if the gentleman will call at my office some time I will show him a great batch of letters from ex-Federal soldiers—men who faced the leaden hail at Chancellorsville, and at Antietam, and at Sharpsburg, and at the terrible charge at Malvern Hill—who tell me they approve of the stand I took against making the pension roll of this Government a roll of graft and dishonor.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DIES. I do.

Mr. FOWLER. If your people were in favor of pensions as liberal as the House is enacting, what would be your course?

Mr. DIES. In that case I suppose I would do just as the gentleman from Illinois does—I would vote to keep myself in office. [Laughter.] But I am in hopes that the time will come when the real soldiers of the country and the taxpayers of the country will grow weary and disgusted with the excesses to which you have carried this thing.

I am not appealing to my friend to my left, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY]. I had as well go stand upon the shores of the ocean and tell the waves to cease their agitation. I had as well, in the language of my friend Shakespeare, "make question with the hungry wolf" as with my friend who has just interrupted me. But I hope to speak over his head to the old Federal soldiers who actually smelt powder and felt lead, and to the taxpayers of his district who are paying the bill for his prodigality; and at their hands I hope to raise a public opinion that in this day in which we are legislating shall separate good pensions from bad pensions, and shall leave the good pensions to those who deserve them, and shall strike down the Congressman who votes for bad pensions to save his own political life.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will my friend yield just once more?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes; twice more.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman says he is appealing to the people of my district.

Mr. DIES. To the people of everybody's district.

Mr. LANGLEY. So far as the people of my district are concerned, I will say to the gentleman that he has been appealing for several years and has not made any progress nor affected a single vote. No one has paid the slightest attention to what he has said. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIES. Well—

While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.

[Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; and I may add, for the information of the gentleman, that my vote has been getting larger and larger all the time; so that if the gentleman's speeches have had any effect there it has been in a direction contrary to his contention.

Mr. DIES. Yes; your vote may be getting larger all the time, but the pension roll has been getting larger, too. It is all getting larger. If I would take the advice of my friends here, I would make no differentiation between a good pension and a bad pension, but would vote for all of them. Of course, the American people do not care how much money we appropriate. That is demonstrated by the fact that we are appropriating money faster now than we ever did before, and nobody is interested in a cessation of appropriations.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Does not the gentleman think these rich men whom we are touching now for an income tax will say something about appropriations?

Mr. DIES. Yes; but we will never bring about reform while the direct tax is upon the wealthy alone. I am almost persuaded that the income tax should be amended to reach the small fortunes as well as the large ones, for the reason that the American people would then keep their eye on Congress and take note of the character of the appropriations you make with the people's money. You can not stop this business so long as the people of the United States do not care.

As long as they pay their taxes indirectly, in a way that they do not feel, we can vote money for any purpose we please, and the people will stand for it.

Now, I want to discuss this bill. It gives pensions to all of the widows, not of Spanish War veterans alone, because this bill makes no such limitation, but if some young woman, 17 years old to-day, marries a man who served in the Army within the days prescribed by this bill, she will get a pension when her husband dies, no matter if he is electrocuted to-morrow. Do you get that? A Spanish War veteran or a Regular Army soldier a week ago or a month ago killed a man. He is in Sing Sing to-day, and he will be electrocuted to-day, and to-day a young woman 16 or 18 or 20 years old steps up to his cell and marries him. This bill says she shall have a pension so long as she lives.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. DIES. Oh, yes. I hear gentlemen saying, Oh, no. I say Oh, yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is his name?

Mr. DIES. I do not know what his name is. It does not make any difference, my friend will vote for it. If that man is electrocuted to-morrow, and if a woman marries him after he is convicted and is in the death cell, this bill gives her a pension while she lives.

Mr. AVIS. May I direct the gentleman's attention to lines 20, 21, and 22 of this act, which provides that said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act.

Mr. DIES. Yes; and I put it previous to the passage of the act, because you have not passed the act yet. I want you to get that. You have not passed this act yet.

Mr. AVIS. Will the act apply if it does not pass?

Mr. DIES. No; but suppose you pass it to-night, and the man was electrocuted at 10 o'clock to-day and was married at 10 o'clock yesterday, under the provisions of this bill she would get a pension for the rest of her life.

Mr. AVIS. That is a rather violent presumption.

Mr. DIES. Yes; and it is a violent bill that gives rise to it.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman does not mean to tell the committee—I know he does not believe it——

Mr. DIES. I yield for a question.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then, do you believe that any woman would be permitted to marry a convict on the day or the eve of his execution?

Mr. DIES. Oh, you had that over in New York a few years ago.

Mr. GOULDEN. Please give us the case.

Mr. DIES. The Patrick case. The woman married him in the death cell, or was it prior to conviction; but after his indictment.

Mr. DALE. Oh, no; she married him in the Tombs.

Mr. DIES. She married him in the Tombs, somebody says.

Mr. GOULDEN. I know the gentleman wishes to state the facts, because I know him too well to think he would want to do anything else. In the case to which my friend alludes the marriage took place before the trial, but after Patrick's arrest, and evidently for the purpose of closing the mouth of an important witness against him.

Mr. DIES. At any rate she married him after the commission of the crime with which he was charged, and if he had been a soldier in the Army under the terms of this bill she would have been entitled to a pension if he had been electrocuted.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman was stating a case of electrocution, and Patrick was not electrocuted.

Mr. DIES. Certainly not. Nobody ever said he was.

Mr. LANGLEY. But you were trying to illustrate your argument by a case——

Mr. DIES. If a man has committed a crime of that kind and has been sentenced to death, and he marries before the passage of this bill, then if he dies, no matter what kills him, if he is hanged by the neck until he is dead, his widow will get a pension under the provisions of this bill, and I defy any man in this Congress to say the contrary.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will say to the gentleman that that, of course, would be a very rare case.

Mr. DIES. I do not yield for a statement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ANSBERRY. If the gentleman will offer an amendment to take care of that very unusual case, I shall be glad to support it.

Mr. DIES. Oh, yes; but the trouble with this bill is that it is so full of injustice that no amendment which left the enacting clause could cure it.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I think that would be a very dangerous precedent to set.

Mr. DIES. I think it would be.

Mr. ANSBERRY. But that kind of a case depends on something which the gentleman in his imagination thinks is on the statute books——

Mr. DIES. I decline to yield.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. How many cases of that kind does the gentleman think there would be under this bill?

Mr. DIES. If we continue to prostitute the electorate of this country and pass these pension bills, and hold out the inducement to them to become crippled when they are not crippled, and to claim they were injured in the service when they were not, and to claim they are indigent when they are not, we may break down the morality of this country until there will be a good many of them electrocuted for crime, because I know of nothing which so demoralizes the people as this sort of legislation. In the case of a widow of the Civil War, which was a real war—this war we are talking about now was only a skirmish——

Mr. ANSBERRY. Does the gentleman assert that the Spanish-American War veterans are getting pensions under this bill? Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman made a statement in harmony with that and in harmony with nothing else.

Mr. DIES. I will tell you what you are doing, you are making the bill more liberal to the widow of the Spanish War veteran than you are for the widow of the Civil War veteran. That is true, because under the general law applying to widows of the Civil War unless they married subsequent to June 27, 1890, they can get no pension. Under this bill the young woman who married an ex-soldier yesterday, and he died to-day, no matter what he died of, can get a pension to-morrow if she can show that she did not have an income of $250 a year. Now, I want the attention of my verbose friend from Ohio.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will say to my verbose friend that he has my attention; and I may say, further, that almost every assertion that he has made is based on a misunderstanding.

Mr. DIES. The bill provides that if the child of a Spanish War veteran is a cripple it shall draw a pension for life. If he is the child of a Civil War veteran, he can not draw a pension under the law after he is 16 years of age.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman is not stating the facts.

Mr. DIES. I am stating the facts under this bill.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. DIES. For a question.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Within the last 10 minutes the gentleman criticized the House and the Committee on Invalid Pensions for reporting out a bill for the son of a Civil War veteran who was pensioned because he was a helpless invalid.

Mr. DIES. I simply called attention to the fact. Why, my friend does not know the difference between a statement of facts and a criticism.

Mr. ANSBERRY. No, no; not when the gentleman criticizes. It is not legitimate criticizing; it is carping and faultfinding.

Mr. DIES. O, Mr. Chairman, I will not say that my friend is verbose; he is lachrymose. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. I might with propriety reciprocate.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I mean no unkindness to my friend from Ohio, for I admire him greatly. He says I am criticizing the House. I am not criticizing the House; I have the highest regard for its membership. It is the most magnificent legislative body on earth. [Laughter and applause.] I am trying to protect it from the commission of legislative follies by pointing out inconsistencies in the legislation. Here is a case of an old Civil War veteran. His body was shot full of lead in 1861 to 1865 in a war where men fell like leaves in Vallombrosa, where in one battle there were more men killed or wounded than were ever engaged in battles in the Spanish-American War, yet if that old fellow has a child who wants a pension after he is 16 years old you can extend him no relief. Yet this young man under this bill, who never saw the gaping mouth of a cannon, if one of his children is poor and indigent, under the terms of this bill he draws a pension not only up to the time he is 16 years of age, but during his natural life.

Mr. AVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. If the gentleman thinks that I am not stating the fact.

Mr. AVIS. Is it not a fact that that provision applies to the minor child who is insane, idiotic, or otherwise perfectly helpless?

Mr. DIES. And it provides a pension for the rest of their natural lives. But if born of a Civil War veteran, if his father was shot to death in the war, he can only draw a pension until he is 16 years of age.

Mr. SELLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. SELLS. I ask the gentleman to read lines 10 and 11, on page 2.

Mr. DIES. Oh, I have read the entire bill. The bill is a very short one. I am trying to discuss the facts under it. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, let him get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-morrow and read the discussion and then show me where I have misstated the terms of this bill. I have not misstated the terms of the bill. You have provided terms more liberal for the soldiers of the Spanish-American War than you have for the soldiers of the Civil War.

Mr. SELLS. Will the gentleman explain in what way.

Mr. DIES. I will in a moment after I have disposed of a little thing I have in mind. Now, the report says that about 450,000 served in the Army between these dates. I forget now, but a great many of them were soldiers in the Regular Army, a great many of them never saw Cuba, and, in fact, very few of them did. As stated by my colleague [Mr. CALLAWAY], whose veracity I believe is unquestioned in this House, a young man went from his town. He never got to Cuba. He got more money by serving in the Army than he got serving on the farm in Comanche County. He wore better clothes, he had better shoes, he did less work; and when he came back from this bloodless campaign he was congratulating himself upon the fact that he had had a fine trip over the country, had seen many cities and towns, and had felt fine, while he drew a monthly salary from the Government of the United States.

Now, this bill proposes that that man when he gets married and dies, his wife shall have a pension the balance of her natural life. Here were Regular soldiers in the Army who never saw the conflict in Spain or Cuba, and yet you are going to give their widows a pension as soon as the husbands die. Why, Mr. Chairman, the truth about the matter is we have carried the pension business to a great excess. I understand why the Civil War pension was carried to an excess. It was a most sanguinary struggle. Here were over 2,000,000 soldiers on one side and six or seven hundred thousand on the other side. They were of the same blood; they were all gallant; one side of the conflict was defending what they conceived to be the Union of the States and the flag of the Union, and the other side in the conflict were defending what they conceived to be their inalienable rights under the Constitution to protect their homes and their firesides. So they met upon many a field of bloody conflict from the first Manassas until the gallant Lee surrendered the Southern Army to the gallant Grant at Appomattox. Our people were anxious that these magnificent men, these brave patriots, these men who had fought the bloody battles, who had lived in the cheerless camps, should be protected in their old age.

But now you come and you say that every Regular soldier, every man who enlisted for 90 days and took a little excursion around the country, saw Tampico, or got on a transport and rode around a little, or got on the train and rode around a little, or drilled across the meadow a little bit with his captain, back and forth, who never smelt powder or felt lead, who never saw the color of a Spaniard's eye nor heard the angry intonations of his voice—he is to have a pension, and when he dies his widow is to have a pension.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes. I feel that perhaps my friend is angry with me, and I will yield to him to put him in good humor.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Oh, no. This is the second time the gentleman has made the statement that we are going to pension the soldiers of the Spanish War. I would like to have the gentleman point out in this bill where he understands we pension the soldiers of the Spanish War. The gentleman misunderstands the purpose of the bill.

Mr. DIES. This is a very small bill, and I believe even my friend from Ohio could understand it if he would sit down and read it over carefully.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Does the gentleman think that this bill gives a pension to any man?

Mr. DIES. Oh, no; this bill is for the widows and minor children.

Mr. ANSBERRY. But the gentleman keeps reiterating the statement that we are to pension the soldiers.

Mr. DIES. This is a supplementary bill. If you are going to give the soldiers pensions, it would be better to give it to the soldier who is in indigent circumstances than to give it to some young woman who married him 10 or 12 or 15 years after the war was over and who had no connection with the service rendered by the soldier.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Would the gentleman support a bill of that character?

Mr. DIES. Oh, no. If I had my way about it, I would purge this pension roll until every man who was on it would be proud of the fact that his name was on the pension roll instead of being ashamed. I would make it so that that great soldier in Massachusetts, Gen. Adams, the grandson of a President and the great-grandson of another President, who served four years in the Civil War on the Federal side, would not be ashamed to admit that his name was on the pension roll. He says that he is ashamed of your pension roll now.

No; Mr. Chairman, this will have no effect upon our regular bimonthly special pension bills. The boys will get their allotment as usual. The pensioning of those who can get the ear of Congressmen every two weeks will continue as before. Let no one be disturbed along that line. The object of this bill is to take in practically all of the 450,000 who were in any way connected with the service during this Spanish-American War. Talk to an old soldier of the Civil War about the great conflict between Spain and the United States! Why, down at El Caney and around San Juan they actually lost 300 or 400 men! They actually had wounded 1,100 or 1,200 men. The amount of carnage around El Caney and San Juan, if it had occurred in the clashes between Lee and Grant or Fighting Joe Hooker, would have been regarded as attributable, probably, to protecting some baggage trains, some little skirmish. Yet, you propose to take up these 450,000 men who belonged to the Army when this little conflict or skirmish was in progress and give them pensions more liberally than you gave to the Civil War veterans 15 years after the Civil War. Where is all this going to stop? Will the people ever find out that they pay the taxes? Will it be found out by the people in Indiana and Texas and all over this country that they are paying $2 for every man, woman, and child in the country to pay pensions with; that every man with a wife and five children is paying $14 a year as pension tax? Will the people of this country ever find out that all of these millions we are dealing out with lavish hands comes out of the coats on their backs and the hats on their heads, and in many cases the food upon their tables?

If the American people ever find out that they are paying these bills, I would hate to know what would happen to those of us who are so liberal with the people's money. Why, do you know that James A. Garfield, who was an honored officer in the Civil War, said 30 years ago, when the pensions were about $30,000,000 a year, that every worthy soldier had been provided for, and that the American taxpayers might expect that from then on the pension roll would grow smaller each year? To-day the pension payment per annum is about $180,000,000. It is being paid to the old heroes of the Civil War, and now we have opened the floodgates to a lot of young, husky gentlemen and their young, healthy, and active widows, and their appetites, of course, will be greater, if such a thing is possible, than the appetites of those already on the pension roll. They have themselves organized all over the United States, in every congressional district. They have their eyes on Congress, and the people who pay the money to pay the taxes are looking the other way. So we might reasonably expect every few sessions of Congress that these amounts will be increased, that these limitations will be stricken out, and the men will get larger and fatter and easier pensions than ever before.

I am told that many multimillionaires are upon the pension roll. Just last year poor Roddenbery, who stood over there and who to-day stands along the pearly streets and the golden gates of the new Jerusalem, called attention to the fact that the Commissioner of Pensions, with a salary of $5,000 a year, was himself drawing a pension. Over and over again have I heard it said that bankers in certain towns, men of great means in certain towns, were drawing pensions on account of some sort of service rendered to the Government.

What is your old Civil War veteran going to say, Gen. SHERWOOD, when he walks along the street with his empty sleeve or his wooden leg and some husky young fellow 35, 36, or 37 years old comes tripping by and that old fellow says you have been treated better by the Government than I was treated 15 years after the war? What is your old Civil War veteran going to say to you, my friend, Mr. ANSBERRY, when it is pointed out to him that his helpless child may be dropped permanently from the pension roll at 16 years of age and the daughter or the son of a husky young man who never smelled powder and never got to a war is to be kept on the rolls so long as life doth last? There is danger, Mr. Chairman, that we might overdo this thing. There is danger that the real old heroes of the Civil War may become tired of the making of more favorable terms for the fair-weather soldiers than were made for those who actually saw strife in the days of the Civil War. But let us see. I am going on the supposition, of course, that the people do not care how much taxes they pay as long as they do not know they are paying it. I am going on the supposition that the people will never turn anybody out of Congress for voting for any appropriation for the reason that they do not care.

But here is a soldier who hired himself to the Government as a Regular soldier. Probably he got more than he could get on the farm; certainly he does less work. This Regular soldier went out and served for three years and was never exposed to danger. He never saw any war. He never saw any conflict. He had been working pretty hard on his father's farm and he felt like three years' rest and recuperation would do him good. He comes back home and spends the balance of his life, very likely, hanging around the old man and telling what great sights he saw and what wonderful trips he made, and 15 years after that he is married. He marries some healthy young woman, and after he gets married he goes out to cut a bee tree and the tree falls on him and kills him. Do you think his widow ought to be placed on the pension rolls for her natural life? Is it just to the toiling millions of this country; is it just to the farmer, who has had to toil in the sleet and rain; is it just to the miner, who, hundreds of feet under the ground, digs coal and gold and mineral products of this country out of the bowels of the earth; is it just to the old fellow who is laying brick upon the scaffold; is it fair to the laborers of this country to give that woman a pension for her natural life? Take another case of a Regular soldier. Here is a young fellow who was patriotic and game when the war between the United States and Spain broke out. The brass band played; it played Dixie and the Bonnie Blug Flag and Yankee Doodle; and he enlisted and went out to a camp, drilling around a little, drawing his pay and commutation of rations, as the case may be, and presently Sampson and Schley defeated Cervera's fleet, and Roosevelt and Wheeler and the other generals defeated that little army down there, and this soldier suddenly gets notice that his services were no longer wanted.

Some 15 years after having drawn this salary from the Government, for services the Government could not use, he marries and gets into a drunken fight with some fellow in a saloon and that fellow kills him. Do you think the laborer, the farmer, the toiling taxpayer of this country ought to pension the widow of that soldier who had no connection with the war, who was probably a child at the time of the war between Spain and the United States, and whose husband rendered no service, but drew his monthly pay for sitting around in camps and drilling on the green? Are you willing to go home and tell your farmer constituents, are you willing to go home and tell the laborers in your district, are you willing to go out and meet the laborers on the streets of the towns of your district fairly and squarely and tell them that you voted to tax them to provide these kinds of pensions? No; when the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be printed to-morrow, and when the types are cold and the words are said, you will not find in the RECORD any man making the statement that he is willing to tax the toilers of this country to pension the people who had no connection with the war and whose husbands rendered no service to their country. What does it do? It will bring to the door of the Treasury every indigent person in the country. It is causing the people throughout this country to believe the Government of the Untied States is a great eleemosynary institution to send out alms, pensions, and appropriations to the people. The Government of the United States never had a dollar except that which is taxed out of the pockets of the people. The Government can not create it, and it is not exercising its legitimate functions if it supports and is not supported by the people. The Government is the organization of the people, and it is the duty of the people to support the Government. Do you know what you are doing with this Spanish War business and all of these pensions? The old fellows who paid their taxes, some of them with their leg off, some with their arm off, some with their eye out, many of whom have paid this burden and now they are reaching their decline of life, their hands are palsied with age, and poverty is staring them in the face. They are saying, "Do you not think, Mr. Congressman, since I have been taxed so much for pensions all these years, when I have been paying taxes for pensions, do not you think I ought to have a pension now in my old age?" This sort of legislation is bringing us rapidly to old-age pensions.

Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. ELDER. Do you not think that that character of an old man is more entitled to it than those covered under this bill?

Mr. DIES. Ten hundred thousand times more; yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the provisions in this law are more favorable than the provisions in the law already, regarding pensions to children under 16, and to insane, idiotic, and helpless children?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman know that that provision is copied word for word from the present statute relating to the Civil War veterans?

Mr. DIES. If it is, I will accept the gentleman's statement. They make so many kinds of pension laws that I can not have them all at my fingers' ends or on the end of my tongue. I do know that the law provides that the widow who married a Civil War veteran since June 27, 1890, can not get a pension under the law, and I do know that under this bill one who married a Spanish War veteran or a member of the Regular Army of the United States yesterday can get it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; but that is much longer after the Civil War than this is after the Spanish War.

Mr. DIES. Yes; much longer.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Oh, yes.

Mr. POST. I understand the gentleman is criticizing this bill because of the limitation that is placed on the right of a widow to obtain a pension?

Mr. DIES. I will correct my friend. He does not understand my speech.

Mr. POST. I do. I would like to ask if the policy in this bill is not different than the policy of the Government in pensioning widows of soldiers of the Civil War which permitted them to receive pensions, having married the soldier after the Civil War, up to the limitation of June 27, 1890?

Mr. DIES. I do not know what the policy of the Government has been. The pension laws have been changed so often that it is hard to keep track of them in some particulars. I do know that we gave the soldiers of the Civil War more pensions than they asked for, and I can prove it by my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE], because he testified to it here in the Sixty-first or the Sixty-second Congress.

Now let us take the question of my good friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELDER]. Let us see. Here is an old farmer, we will say. He is a good illustration, because he is the innocent bystander who gets hit every time an assault is made upon the Treasury. This old farmer is 80 years old. He had some boys and he worked them on the farm. One of his boys got lazy and said, "Pa, I believe I will join the Army, where I won't have to work."

And so the boy, who was not willing to go out and labor on the farm, joined the Army. He read dime novels and he rode the officer's horse to water and wore better clothes than he ever had before and had a better time than he ever had before. And then he came home, and after two or three crops he got some woman to marry him. And while the old man was busy in his field raising his corn, and his cane, and his cotton, or his oats, or his wheat this son ran about over the country fishing, probably, lying out half drunk on the bank of some creek where he got the malarial fever from which he died. And his wife is to draw a pension the balance of her life, while the mother and the father of the boy, those who brought him up and gave him what little education he had—those who probably helped to support him after he was married—that old man tottering along at 85 years of age, and by his side his old blind wife, bowed over with age, poor and neglected, meet this young widow, 18 or 19 years of age, drawing a pension out of the taxes of the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, what is it going to do? It is going to bring a general old-age pension law. You are breaking down the manhood in this United States. You are making the mob in New York believe that they are entitled to bread whether they labor for it or not. All over this country you are causing farmers and old laborers who neglected to lay up something for old age to believe they possess an inherent right to eat out of the public crib. Already the 500,000 Government clerks have organized themselves to get pensions to be paid for by the people. Why should they not get them? Why should not the old men and old women get them? Why should not those who work for the Government get them? Why should not the 210 rear admirals get them? Why should not other officers get them before they become rear admirals, or afterwards? Why should not everybody have a pension, if you bestow them without regard to service rendered? You bestow them, I almost said, in order to accomplish a political purpose among the people who are to receive the benefit.

Now, what happens? Here are a great many of the wives of Federal soldiers; here are a great many of the soldiers themselves. A private bill is passed, or this general bill is passed. They are organized. They are there to require the Congressman to help them get it. Will this bill satisfy them? No. This bill will not satisfy those who served in the Spanish-American War or those who were in the Army when that war was in progress. You might as well try to dip the Pacific Ocean dry with a single bucket; you might as well attempt to fill the casket of Danaides, as to try to satisfy the appetites of those who are getting pensions or hope to secure pensions.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to submit a parliamentary inquiry? I want to know how much time the gentleman has consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. LANGLEY. Some gentlemen are getting a little sleepy over on this side of the House and are anxious to know how much longer we have to listen to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIES. Yes; my friend is getting sleepy. My friend always gets sleepy when some one tries to protect the taxpayers, but when a raid is to be made on the Treasury you can bet that my friend wakes up and gets all that is coming to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. That is right; I always try to get my district's share, and I think the RECORD will show that I usually succeed.

Mr. DIES. When a speech is made in which I ask you to take into consideration the absent man, take into consideration the man that to-day is plowing the furrows in his field, is digging the coal from the mines, or behind the counter is plying his legitimate trade, my friend gets weary and goes to sleep.

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, no; I am very wide awake, I beg to assure the gentleman. I was not referring to myself.

Mr. DIES. But I will tell you one thing right here, my friends: When feeding time comes and the animals begin to roar my friend will wake up. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the more of this sort of business we do, the more we will be expected to do. You have got to give a pension to Spanish War widows to-day. They are organized. Mark the words—they are organized, and you are going to give it to them. You would give it to the aged persons in this country to-morrow if they were organized. All these people who are over 70 years of age need to do is to organize themselves in the different States and Territories of this Union; organize and demand that Congress shall give them an old-age pension, and you will give it to them. You could not get away from giving it to them, because you have broken down the independence of the American people by this sort of legislation. The time has been when men all over this broad Republic would spurn this sort of gratuity at the hands of the Government. They thought they could support themselves and depend upon their own manhood, and all they asked the Government to do was to give them an equal chance in the race of life. But you are educating them differently now. You are teaching them now that the Government is a great charitable institution, with nothing to do but pass pension bills and build railroads. You have got as much patriotism as I have got, and you have got as much sense as I have got; but neither you nor I have got patriotism and the intelligence sufficient, when once you destroy this Republic of the fathers, ever to give back to the people of the United States a Government which gives to them so much of opportunity as this Government, which we are undermining with these miserable principles of socialism. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to consume any time in the discussion of this bill, because we of the Pensions Committee are very anxious to get a vote on it.

I want to compliment the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] on his speech. It is a good speech. Most of us ought to know it, because this is about the fifth time we have heard it since the first of December. [Laughter.] In fact, I am so well acquainted with it now that I believe I could deliver it about as well as he could. [Laughter.]

I see slight reason for any extended discussion of the merits of this bill. Congress long ago committed itself to the practice of pensioning the soldier, his widow and orphan, which practice has received the cordial indorsement of practically every patriotic citizen. The purpose of this bill is to confer on the Spanish War widows and orphans the same rights and privileges as conferred by the act of 1890 upon the widows and orphans of the Civil War soldier. It is the only legislation that has been requested by the Spanish War soldiers as an organization, and this bill, which is virtually the same as the Crago bill which passed the lower House of the Sixty-second Congress, has received practically the unanimous indorsement of these camps and organizations throughout the country. Surely this request, representing as it does the wishes of more than 400,000 of our citizens, is entitled to the favorable consideration of this body.

As a member of the Committee on Pensions during these years, I have been led more and more to a realization of the inadequacy of our present pension laws in their application to this class of widows and minor children. The impossibility of making satisfactory proof of the cause of the soldier's death through lapse of time, inability to locate comrades, and so forth, has, in my judgment, defeated many a meritorious application for pension where the widow and her children were living in penury and want. The Spanish War organizations have contributed liberally to their support, and this responsibility, voluntarily assumed, has proved a burden upon them which is unjust, and from which they should be speedily relieved.

I deplore the disposition of a certain small class of our people to decry the efforts of our comrades to secure this much-needed and richly deserved legislation and to speak sneeringly of the services rendered by the Spanish War soldier. We all admit that, from the standpoint of hardships endured and sacrifices made, his service does not equal that rendered by the soldier of the Rebellion. But the motives which actuated his enlistment and which inspired him to offer his services to his country were as patriotic—and here is the true test, and the only one by which he should be judged and that will give him a place alongside all those of our Republic who, from its beginning, have rallied to its defense, have upheld the honor and glory of our flag, and proved the heroism and fortitude of the American soldier.

According to the records of the War Department, there were enlisted for service in the Spanish-American War more than 400,000 men. There were more than 800 battles and skirmishes, and the mortality was upward of 12,000 men. This does not include the large number who returned to their homes broken by disease and who have since died or have been unable to protect themselves and families from want. For the first time in the history of the Republic the American soldier saw service in foreign fields. In the Tropics and in the Orient, under climatic conditions to which he was unaccustomed and which tested to the limit his powers of physical endurance, he performed his service uncomplainingly and added new luster to the American flag and to the matchless record for bravery and intrepidity of the American soldier.

Let us then accord him his dues, so justly merited, by the passage of this bill in behalf of his widow and orphan. Too long have we delayed this recognition. No other nation on earth deals so liberally with its soldiers. Let us sustain that record by the speedy enactment into law of this bill, giving assistance so greatly needed, and as a token of the regard of the American people for those who have so nobly served their country.

Now, I have requests for time, and I shall not myself consume more time. I want to yield 20 minutes of the time at my disposal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY].

Mr. GORDON. Before doing that, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELLS. Gladly.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman speaks of precedents established by former legislation. Can the gentleman tell this House how the Congress can withstand the requests that will be made by the Spanish-American War veterans themselves for a pension if we pass this bill pensioning the widows of Spanish-American veterans who served in that war?

Mr. SELLS. Well, the passage of this bill in no sense commits us to the idea of pensioning Spanish-American soldiers. They are not asking for it.

Mr. GORDON. Do you favor a pension for the survivors of the Spanish-American War?

Mr. SELLS. I favor this bill, and this is the only bill now under consideration. If the gentleman will introduce a bill to pension the veterans of the Spanish-American War, I shall be glad to take a position on it then.

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, some time since a resolution was introduced by me calling upon the President of the United States to give to the Committee on Foreign Affairs information concerning the conditions in Mexico and information concerning the plans which the administration had put in force for the purpose of affording security to citizens of the United States sojourning in Mexico.

To-day the committee has passed upon the resolution in a way that will not give this House the opportunity of securing the information which the country awaits, if the committee's action be supported, and I am therefore taking this occasion of bringing the matter to your attention.

Mr. Chairman, the great Jefferson gave utterance to a fundamental truth of far-reaching importance when he said:

> No ground of support for the Executive will ever be so sure as a complete knowledge of their proceedings by the people, and it is only in cases where the public good would be injured, and because it would be injured, that proceedings should be secret.

He thus recognized that under our form of government the people were clothed with the responsibility of ultimate decision on great political questions. With this responsibility came the right to know, in order that they might wisely act. Thomas Jefferson thus expressed his confidence, and neither he nor Lincoln, who followed him, were swayed by the view, usually selfishly inspired, that the people could not be trusted.

Believing, with Jefferson and Lincoln, that the membership of this Congress—representatives of the people, charged with grave legislative responsibility, including that of maintaining peace as well as declaring war—are entitled to the fullest and most accurate information concerning matters which vitally affect the welfare of this Nation and the rights of her citizens abroad in its and their relations to other countries, I introduced a resolution requesting the President of the United States, if not incompatible with public interest, to afford this Congress information, from the consular reports and investigations, of conditions in Mexico as affecting the lives and safety of American citizens sojourning there, and to further advise Congress what steps, if any, had been taken by the administration for their security. This resolution was presented because of information coming from Mexico disclosing, if true, a condition there existing involving the rights and safety of American citizens so horrible and unspeakable in detail as to shock the world. The walls of civilized warfare were broken down and neither the lives nor sex of noncombatants were spared by the ignorant, brutal, and lustful looters, constituting the misnamed constitutionalist army of Gen. Villa.

It seeped through to the public's ear that outrage after outrage upon these American citizens had been reported by our consular representatives in Mexico to the State Department at Washington; there, after feeble and ineffective protests, to be pigeonholed and to gather dust while the administration watched and waited.

The people of the United States desire peace both in and with Mexico. Because of it they, too, have watchfully waited for some realization of the expressed assurance of the Chief Executive that peace would soon reign in Mexico. The country can no longer blind its eyes to the fact that Mexican conditions are growing worse instead of better, and that the policy of the President consisted of sound rather than substance.

The President, exerting the pressure of his high position, has asked the Congress of the United States to surrender its right of independent judgment; to reverse the policy of a great Nation already worked into law; to repudiate the platform declaration of his own and other political parties, and to do so in the face of his own strongly stated preelection utterance.

He asks the Members of this Congress to reverse themselves without a fact being divulged or a reason presented for such a remarkable request other than the vague and disquieting suggestion of international complications of grave importance and nearer consequence. So grave and important and of nearer consequence are these international matters that the membership of this House must no longer think or judge for themselves, but are called upon to abandon principles and position heretofore taken and advocated, because an extreme condition has arisen in international affairs requiring this surrender of brain and heart and mind and plan.

The tolls speech of the President created great anxiety in the hearts of the people of this country. It said too much or too little. It led one irresistibly to the conclusion that the Mexican policy of the President has not borne the full fruitage he expected for it, but that complications have arisen possibly involving Mexico's relations with Germany and Japan requiring us to have the moral support of England, in payment for which the American people are asked to repeal the toll provision exempting American ships engaged in coastwise trade.

Whatever may be the administration's reasons, they should not be hidden in a corner. This Nation can not support an unknown as against a known policy. When the officially ascertained facts are withheld from them, the public will be forced to form their conclusions from unofficial sources.

DE FACTO GOVERNMENT OF HUERTA.

Starting with a false premise which has led him to run counter to approved diplomatic precedents in refusing to recognize the de facto government of Gen. Huerta and in making demands so drastic in character and contrary to the announced and long-standing policy of noninterference of this Government as to be in themselves under the law of nations acts of war, the President has found himself unsupported by a single nation other than the negative support which may be implied by the obedience of three South American Republics to the request of the United States to withhold for the present their recognition of Gen. Huerta.

The President's position as first taken was not that President Huerta did not represent the de facto Mexican Government, but that he had acquired his power and position by revolutionary and treasonable methods in contravention to the Mexican constitution, and that he was at least consenting to the death of President Madero.

Mr. Seward, while Secretary of State in 1862, said:

> This Government acts directly and sincerely in its intercourse with foreign nations, and no less directly and sincerely with New Granada than with all others. It regards the government of each State as its head until the government is effectually displaced by the substitution of another. It abstains from any interference with its domestic affairs in foreign countries and it holds no unnecessary communication, secret or otherwise, with revolutionary parties or factions therein. It neither seeks to prevent social or political reforms in such countries nor lends its aid to reforms of them rightfully of which it has neither the authority nor the means to judge.

Mr. Cass in 1859 said:

> No matter how strongly the sympathies of the United States may be with the liberal constitutional party in Mexico, our Government can not properly intervene in its behalf without violating a cardinal feature of our foreign policy.

Mr. Van Buren, giving instructions regarding Colombia, said:

> So far as we are concerned, that which is the government de facto is equally so de jure.

Mr. Van Buren, concerning Brazil, said:

> The course which had ever been before pursued by the United States of always recognizing the government existing de facto.

The message of President Pierce as to the American policy with respect to recognition of Latin-American Governments was presented to Congress May 15, 1856:

> It is the established policy of the United States to recognize all governments without question of their source or organization or of the means by which the governing persons attain their power, provided there be a government de facto accepted by the people of the country, and with reserve only of time as to the recognition of revolutionary governments arising out of the subdivision of parent States with which we are in relations of amity. We do not go behind the fact of a foreign Government's exercising actual power to investigate questions of legitimacy; we do not inquire into the causes which led to a change of government. To us it is indifferent whether a successful revolution has been aided by foreign intervention or not; whether insurrection has overthrown existing governments and another has been established in its place according to preexisting forms or in a manner adopted for the occasion by those whom we may find in the actual possession of power. All these matters we leave to the people and public authorities of the particular country to determine, and their determination whether it be by positive action or by ascertained acquiescence is to us a sufficient warranty of the legitimacy of the new government.

During the 67 years which have elapsed since the establishment of the existing Government of the United States, in all which time this Union has maintained undisturbed domestic tranquillity, we have had occasion to recognize governments de facto, founded either by domestic revolution or by military invasion from abroad, in many of the Governments of Europe.

It is the more imperatively necessary to apply this rule to the Spanish-American Republics in consideration of the frequent and not seldom anomalous changes of organization or administration which they undergo and the revolutionary nature of most of the changes.

ULTIMATUM AN ACT OF INTERVENTION AND WAR.

Not content with a refusal of recognition of the de facto government the President has involved this country in a second position from which it can not escape without loss of dignity and prestige, violating a well-established and wise rule of noninterference with the political affairs of other countries.

The President's oft-repeated utterance that "Huerta must go"; the special representative sent by this Government to Mexico to deliver this ultimatum and seek its accomplishment was in itself intervention. It was not an act of peace but was an act of war, and would no doubt have been treated as such had it been directed against any of the great nations of the world sufficient in power to have resented it.

Mr. Buchanan, in 1848, said:

We recognize the right of all nations to create and reform their political institutions according to their own will and pleasure. We do not go behind the existing government to involve ourselves in the question of its legitimacy. It is sufficient for us to know that a government exists capable of maintaining itself, and then its recognition on our part inevitably follows.

President Polk said:

The policy of the United States has ever been that of nonintervention in the domestic affairs of other countries, leaving to each to establish the form of government of its own choice.

Mr. Clayton, in 1849, said:

We as a nation have ever been ready and willing to recognize any government de facto which appeared capable of maintaining its power.

Mr. Seward, speaking of the Government of the United States in its dealings with Mexico, said:

While earnest to guard and protect the rights of its own citizens and the safety of its own territory, it does not seek to intervene in political contests or changes of administration. It does not scrutinize closely the regularity or irregularity of the methods by which Presidents are inaugurated.

Mr. Van Buren said:

An invariable and strict neutrality between belligerents and an entire abstinence from all interference in the concerns of other nations are cardinal traits of the foreign policy of this Government. The obligatory character of this policy is regarded by its constituents with a degree of reverence and submission but little, if anything, short of that which is entertained for the Constitution itself.

On another occasion he said:

One of the settled principles of this Government is that of noninterference in the domestic concerns of nations; and as it would not tolerate it in others, so must every act of its own functionaries which might be construed into a departure from this principle incur the decided disapprobation of the President.

There is little doubt but that the President thought this intervention would accomplish the speedy overthrow of Gen. Huerta, but Gen. Huerta is apparently more strongly intrenched than ever. From European—possibly Japanese, and certainly French—and local sources he has secured sufficient funds with which to carry on, if not an extensive, at least a wholly adequate defensive campaign.

INTERVENTION IN BEHALF OF REBELS.

Failing in his plans to unseat Huerta, the President proceeded to a third impossible position, of giving moral support and encouragement to the rebel outlaws and looters of the north under Gen. Villa, who holds nominal allegiance to Gen. Carranza.

Of the federal soldiers interned in Texas, a distinguished gentleman in another body, presenting the position of the administration, said:

Expressing simply my own opinion, I have no doubt that it is very agreeable to the administration to withhold from the conflict in Mexico soldiers from Huerta's army.

If this be true, what becomes of the claimed neutral position of this Government in dealing with the belligerent forces in Mexico?

It is known to some within the sound of my voice that, as recently expressed, the administration's hope for peace in Mexico was based upon the success of the constitutionalist forces. How vain the hope, and undesirable the accomplishment, is becoming more apparent each day.

Mexico occupies a territory equal in extent to all of the United States east of the Mississippi River, excluding New York and New England. Its population is about 15,000,000, of whom 3,000,000 are white, 6,500,000 mixed, and 5,500,000 Indians. Five sparsely settled States in the north, with 3,000,000 inhabitants, are overrun by Gen. Villa and his army; 22 States, with 12,000,000 inhabitants, are under the control of Gen. Huerta and his army. The most reliable information available is that the constitutionalist forces number 7,000 men.

The disparity of conditions is at once apparent, but the physical difference is not to be mentioned beside the moral divergence.

A letter is before me, written from Mexico City, by an American citizen with neither property in nor political affiliations with that country, nor has he particular sympathy for Gen. Huerta personally. He states that the territory controlled by Huerta is at peace, military it is true, but it brings, in large measure, a sense of security, which would be turned to appalling dismay were it thought for a moment it could be supplanted by the barbaric savagery of the constitutionalists under Villa.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AINEY. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. Does the gentleman consider that the Huerta government is now manifesting its ability to maintain itself?

Mr. AINEY. If the gentleman refers to the papers of to-day, the dispatches in which were no doubt inspired by those supporting Gen. Villa, and influenced largely from the Hibbs Building in Washington, I frankly say I do not give credence to all such statements. I believe even to-day, handicapped as he has been by reason of the violation of the principles of neutrality and recognition which have heretofore led this country to act, still Gen. Huerta is better qualified to bring peace in Mexico than any other Mexican in sight. [Applause.] Does that answer the genteman?

Mr. KEATING. It does not answer my question entirely. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. AINEY. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman inform the House upon what information he bases his statement that the dispatches in this morning's Post, which presumably came over the Associated Press wires, were written in the Hibbs Building in Washington?

Mr. AINEY. The gentleman misunderstood me if he thought I said they were written in the Hibbs Building. I suggested to the gentleman that they were undoubtedly inspired from the Hibbs Building. If the gentleman will look at the papers he will find they are not Associated Press dispatches. Giving all credence to the reporter, the reporter has to get his information from inspired sources in Mexico, from the interests supporting Villa; and I would like to suggest to the gentleman that the purpose of my resolution, which the Foreign Affairs Committee has not seen fit to report favorably, under a suggestion which, I assume, comes from the administration that it be not so reported, has deprived us, and the gentleman as well as myself, of the opportunity of knowing the details of conditions in Mexico as the representatives of the American people in this Congress are entitled to know them. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for just one more question?

Mr. AINEY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that this Government ought to recognize Gen. Huerta's administration in Mexico?

Mr. AINEY. My position, if I may make it plain to the gentleman, is that there was a time when the President could have recognized Gen. Huerta, and that he should have recognized him then, and if he had done so these questions which are now causing anxiety to the American heart would not have caused the President of the United States to come into this House and from this rostrum humiliatingly advocate not the cause of American interests, but the cause of a foreign country and a foreign nation, and a condition of great importance and near consequence which causes him anxiety would never have occurred. [Applause on the Republican side.] I still believe that if the President wants peace rather than war in Mexico it were better to recognize Huerta to-day than any other person now in Mexico.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman pardon me for one more question?

Mr. AINEY. Yes; but I trust the gentleman will not take up too much of my time.

Mr. KEATING. I will ask only one more question.

Mr. AINEY. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has stated that there was a time when, in his judgment, this Government could have recognized Huerta. Now, I want to ask the gentleman was that after Huerta had assassinated Madero or after he had shot the members of the Mexican Parliament who refused to obey his instructions?

Mr. AINEY. The accredited representative of this great Nation, Henry Lane Wilson, ambassador from this country to Mexico, whose name has been wholly unimpeached, except by the sinister remarks that have seeped through the public press on occasions, said that in his judgment Gen. Huerta was not guilty of consenting to the murder of Madero.

But I disclaim to hold any card for Huerta. Admitting all that you desire to charge against Gen. Huerta, there are still certain general principles which ought to govern one nation in recognizing the de facto government of another.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AINEY. Is it possible for the gentleman to yield me any more time?

Mr. SELLS. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes additional.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is a student of international law. Is it not true that on two separate occasions this administration did recognize Huerta as the de facto head of the Government there?

Mr. AINEY. Oh, yes; the gentleman understands that. There is no question about it. Recognition does not involve the question of the moral character of the executive of a country. I have tried to call the attention of gentlemen of this House to the statements of men who have had charge of our international affairs—our Secretaries of State and our former Presidents. I have called attention to innumerable instances where the doctrine has been laid down that this country is not responsible for the moral character of the ruler of another country. What we are seeking is peace with Mexico; and, so far as I am concerned, without attempting in any wise to weigh the moral difference between Gen. Huerta on the one side and the outlaw Villa on the other, or any of the others in Mexico, I do say to the gentleman and to Members here who listen to me, that I believe an American citizen, an American wife, an American daughter, and the property of American citizens in Mexico are of more importance than the technical question of the recognition or nonrecognition of Huerta or any other person. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AINEY. I hope the gentleman will not press his question. I have not finished my statement.

I should like to say something about Villa.

WHO IS VILLA?

Inasmuch as the administration pins its hope on the constitutionalists, and Gen. Carranza without Villa is as useless as a locomotive without wheels, one asks, Who is Villa? Villa neither reads nor writes, except as in jail he learned to write his first name, "Francisco." To those who know him as a vulgar, ignorant, and brutal specimen of humanity the high-sounding phrases contained in dispatches purporting to repeat his words carry their own refutation.

An effort to depict him as a hero, driven to the hills by great wrongs inflicted upon him, have failed in the light of truth. The glory with which an inspired press sought to clothe him has been stripped away by the Benton and other gory incidents of his career, and he stands before the world as a hideous monster, gloating over the bodies of his helpless and quivering victims; a man who kills for the love of killing, to whose armored heart appeals for sympathy never reach; a man who has no patriotic sentiments, who has stood for lawlessness rather than for order; a man whose love of war is not inspired by love of liberty nor love of country, but longing for loot. Every general of the constitutionalist army, with the possible technical and nominal exception of Villa, was in pillaging rebellion against Madero.

Villa is without national military sense. He has never yet fought a battle except where the odds were overwhelmingly in his favor, and there are those who know him best who say he will never fight at Torreon unless bribery or the withdrawal of Federal forces gives him the assurances of victory.

Villa belongs to the hills. Peace has no charms for him. Against a strong and resolute force he would not tarry a moment, for he is as cowardly as he is brutal, and he has the weakness and fear of a blustering bully. The success of Villa would turn Mexico over to a reign of terror.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman know that the man of whom he is speaking served in the American Army at Fort Gibson, in New York Harbor, as a private in the Regular Army?

Mr. AINEY. He would have to be a private in a very rear rank if I had anything to do with him. No; I did not know it.

Mr. GOULDEN. I had it on the very best of authority he was then known as George Goldsby.

Mr. AINEY. He has been known by several other names. During his career in Mexico when he robbed one ranch and went to another he found it agreeable to change his name several times.

Mr. GOULDEN. I simply wanted to state that he got his military knowledge in the United States Army.

Mr. AINEY. At Durango, in spite of the protest of the American consul, the city was given over by the constitutionalist general to the unrestrained license of his soldiers for 24 hours because it was said to be the only way of paying them. Little girls scarcely 10 years of age and women did not escape and now hang their heads in awful shame. American women were gathered in MacDonald's Institute, where their husbands barricaded the building and fought to preserve them from the rapacity of the rebel soldiers.

Specific instances, the details too revolting to be repeated, are, I am informed, contained in the consular reports in the archives of the State Department, revealing conditions which affect the rights of American citizens, their wives, children, and property.

The cry of suffering coming up from Mexico uttered by American citizens whose lives have been sacrificed, whose wives and daughters have been ravished, whose property has been confiscated, has not reached the sympathetic and responsive ear of the Chief Executive.

In 1912 there were in Mexico 30,000 Americans engaged in every line of legitimate employment and industry, welcomed there under the law of that land and treaty obligations between the two countries, and they have remained there under the right of protection growing out of their American citizenship and the international obligation resting upon every country with respect to foreign residents. Among them were farmers, artisans, skilled mechanics, cattle raisers, merchants, miners, and bankers.

RIGHTS OF AMERICANS ABROAD.

Again, the President took an unwarranted and highly un-American position in assuming that Americans in Mexico represented a class and interests inimical to Mexican progress and proper development, and that they were largely instrumental in creating the conditions there existing.

Mr. Cass, in 1860, said:

> The United States believes it to be their duty, and they mean to execute it, to watch over the persons and property of their citizens visiting foreign countries and to intervene for their protection when such action is justified by existing circumstances and the law of nations.

Mr. Frelinghuysen said:

> The Government of the United States recognizes the right of Mexico to prescribe the reasonable conditions upon which foreigners may reside within her territory, and the duty of American citizens there to obey the municipal laws, but those laws can not disturb or affect the relationship existing at all times between this Government and one of its citizens. The duty is always incumbent upon a government to exercise a just and proper guardianship over its citizens, whether at home or abroad. A municipal act of another State can not abridge this duty, nor is such an act countenanced by the law or usage of nations.

Justice Miller, 16 Wall., 79:

> Another privilege of a citizen of the United States is to demand the care and protection of the Federal Government over his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government. Of this there can be no doubt, nor that the right depends upon his character as a citizen of the United States.

The President's altruistic desire that Mexico should maintain a constitutional government is a fine conception, but we can not avoid recognizing the ethnological conditions which play a large part in the affairs of that country. For instance, seven tribes of Indians speaking as many different tongues are found within a single State in Mexico.

The land system inherited from the days of Spanish dominion, illiteracy, a lack of industry in agricultural and manufacturing pursuits among the masses, with little spirit of nationalism or patriotic expression, are difficulties to be overcome before Mexico may hope to attain an appreciation of her constitutional rights.

During Diaz's reign marvelous changes occurred; agricultural training, manufactures out of native products, and education of the children have all been emphasized. Compulsory school attendance is now the law, and elementary schools have increased between 1900 and 1910 from about 9,000 to 12,000, with an attendance increased from approximately 500,000 to 1,000,000 during the same period. Nearly 50 per cent of the inhabitants now read and write, and Mexico by her own efforts is slowly solving her internal problems.

How to turn vast acres into small farms and inspire the populace with a desire to own and till them is a problem which has confronted Mexico for a hundred years. The people must acquire the farming desire before any project will be successful. To get a piece of land for the purpose of selling it and not to cultivate it is the mental height to which the masses have thus far attained.

The primitive cupidity of the natives makes it easy for the unscrupulous Mexicans, English, Germans, or Americans to foment revolutions, and, if the stakes are large enough, capitalize them heavily.

There are those who claim that Villa and Carranza have been so capitalized; that S. G. Hopkins, representative of Carranza, of the Hibbs Building, Washington, D. C., could, if summoned before Congress, tell a story of international intrigue by which the illiterate Villa is made the head of a revolutionary army and his words clothed in classic English, according to press dispatches; his common murders garbed as heroic acts of chivalry, that the Standard Oil may advance its Mexican interests through him.

WARNING TO LEAVE MEXICO.

The position adopted by the Executive that Americans should leave Mexico upon his warning, or failing to abandon their homes and property no particular duty or responsibility was owing them by the Government, is abhorrent to one of patriotic senses.

The rights of American citizens are as deep-seated as the rock upon which their claim for liberty rests. It is as fixed as our national heritage. It follows them in every country and every clime. Neither the despotic act of foreign Government nor the edict of their own Chief Executive can legally or morally despoil them of it. The direction of the President to Americans to abandon their all and leave Mexico was as unwarranted as it was un-American. It worked a confiscation of their property as effectually as any act of brigandage perpetrated by the unrestrained marauders of Mexico.

There was but one step more which this Government could take as the climax of its stupendous errors, and that was an armed effort to unseat Huerta. Has it not been contemplated? Have not occasions been sought to justify it? Did not the murder of Benton and the publicity occasioned by it come just in time to prevent the recognition of Carranza? The danger of war comes not from those who seek to know the truth but from those who would conceal it.

A dispatch from Los Angeles, dated March 22, says:

Six Japanese engineers, bearing passports and letters from Gen. Huerta, are now completing an elaborate military survey of Magdalena Bay. This is said to be part of a scheme to make there a Japanese stronghold, with Huerta's approval, and with the assurance that upon the first aggressive move upon the part of the United States Japan would seize the Philippines and join the Mexicans in a war against the United States.

To such questionings and doubt has the secret and inane policy at Washington led us.

A policy based upon a recognition of the rights of American citizens, a firm demand that these rights be protected, expressed in language calculated to reach the ear of every man in Mexico having the semblance of authority would have been heeded.

The dignity of our Nation would not then have been dragged in the dust, the lives and property of our citizens would not have been molested or destroyed. Our flag would have remained the recognized and obeyed symbol of liberty and protection, whether it waived over the great or small, the mighty or the humble.

A nation can not long endure except it be supported by the patriotism of its people. Patriotism can not be engendered except as it is inspired by a sense of protecting strength and support extended its citizens. The pride of American citizenship has been that the American flag embraced in its protecting folds the humblest citizen in every land he chanced to be. When a nation is too busy with academic questions or too indifferent to hear and heed the supplication of her helpless citizens it will have reached the first milestone of disintegration in its downward career, and when the flag of her citizenship fails to afford protection then will come loss of faith in and respect for her institutions; and without faith and respect, love of country soon ceases and the end is near.

If war comes with Mexico; if Huerta, spurned by the United States, turns to Japan, and the price is Magdalena Bay; if the citizens of Germany are murdered in Mexico, and we are thereby involved, the responsibility for the dire result rests upon a weak and obstinate policy which has refused the pathway of safe and patriotic precedent.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman if the speech he is about to extend in the RECORD is the speech in the afternoon paper which is described as "A tongue-lashing President Wilson received in the House to-day"?

Mr. AINEY. No; I did not know such a statement was in the afternoon papers. I know that the press has advanced copies of my address. If it is in the papers this afternoon, I am not aware of it.

Mr. ELDER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ELDER. Is not the gentleman entitled to a full hour in his own time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman received his allotment of time from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SELLS].

Mr. ELDER. Notwithstanding that, is he not entitled to an hour in his own right if he wishes?

Mr. AINEY. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, but in courtesy to the gentleman who yielded me the time and to the House I do not feel that I should ask further indulgence.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that on the bill under consideration it is unnecessary to speak to any great extent. As has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY], in charge of the bill, it was debated at great length in the last Congress and passed the House by an almost unanimous vote. I do not believe there is any difference in sentiment as regards this worthy and meritorious measure in this House and that of the last. This country, Mr. Chairman, is liberal and has been very liberal with its soldiers, their widows and dependents. There is no question about that. There is no doubt that at times pensions have been given where perhaps there was not any great merit, but I doubt if there have been many. They have been the exceptions. It is the desire of the people of this country to be fair and to be liberal to its soldiers and their dependents. We have no great standing Army, and we must depend upon the patriotism of the men to volunteer and to come to the flag and defend the honor of our Nation when there is need. It is much better that we should be liberal in giving pensions to these men and their dependents when there is genuine need than it is to keep in this country a great standing Army.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to say we are more liberal in this country with our soldiers, their minor children and widows, than they are in other countries, yet the expense of the armies of other countries is so much greater than ours that we in the end are benefited even from a financial standpoint. The soldiers of the Spanish War were men of the best blood that we had in America. Their mothers, wives, sisters, and sweethearts were and are the best in the land. Let us be worthy of those splendid men, the dead and the living, and by our votes on this bill testify to our appreciation of their valor, by doing something for the widows and the orphans. When these men go out, Mr. Chairman, for their country's honor and glory, if they know that they are to be treated fairly, if they know that their family and dependents are to be treated fairly, they go with a great deal more willingness and satisfaction, and in the end give better service, because they know their country is grateful.

Mr. Chairman, the need of this legislation is evident to practically every Member of Congress who has Spanish War soldiers, Philippine War soldiers, or widows of such living in their district. Many deserving claims of this nature have been rejected at the Bureau of Pensions because of technicalities or failure of the claimants to be able to secure the evidence required under existing law. Medical testimony is hard to obtain to show the origin of the soldier's disabilities, due in a large measure to the fact that such records were kept either not at all or in such an unsatisfactory manner that no proof of that nature is in many cases available at all. It is also true that many of the soldiers and sailors when discharged the service refused to state that they had anything the matter with them. They were not thinking of pensions when they were discharged, but only of getting home and back to their loved ones. Then, again, many of the comrades of the soldiers and the shipmates of the sailors have scattered, and it is often very difficult to locate them and obtain their testimony as to the origin of diseases complained of. Many deserving cases are thus denied relief, and this bill is the result, and the need for its enactment into law is most necessary. Mr. Chairman, the amount of money involved in the enactment of this bill into law need not trouble anyone. The amount is not great, and certainly it is not worthy of consideration when you put it alongside of the great results accomplished for humanity and our own country in the great and splendid services that these men rendered in these wars and campaigns. Our Nation has been far greater in every respect since the close of the Spanish

War. The results achieved by our armies in the Philippines, by our navies, and what our Government has done there since has been the admiration of the world and a great joy and happiness to the millions of people inhabiting the Philippine Islands. Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines are monuments of the Spanish War and the Philippine insurrection. There were nearly a half million of our soldiers and sailors enlisted for this foreign service; all of them were not needed; but whether they served here or there, they are equally entitled to the thanks and consideration of our country. [Applause.]

[Mr. SHREVE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, if I may digress from the subject at hand, I want to briefly refer to Mexico, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY]. Some gentlemen seem to be chafing under the restraint of peace and anxious for war. In the course of events I may see fit to vote for war with Mexico, on certain conditions. These conditions would be that the men who are asking for war shall organize the first company [laughter], their sons shall organize the second company, and the newspaper men who are striving to rush the country into war shall organize the third company. [Laughter.] When the charge on Mexico is to be made, when our Army is to face the bayonets, I would place the men who are demanding war in the front rank. When they fell down I would have their sons fill up the breach, and when their sons were slaughtered I would have the newspaper men fill up that breach. [Laughter and applause.] And until the men who are calling for war, their sons, and the newspaper men fell down I would not allow a single American to lose his life or shed his blood on Mexican soil. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to take advantage of this occasion to congratulate this country upon this administration—the foreign policy of this administration—and especially upon our Secretary of State, William J. Bryan [applause], the duties of whose office are to maintain friendly relations with the powers of the world and to prevent war. By reason of his great influence and his superior ability he has been able to accomplish more in that line with grape juice than other men have accomplished with cocktails and highballs. [Laughter and applause.]

But I arose to say something about pensions. Pensions are a part of the awful cost of war. It is estimated that 71 per cent of the taxes levied in the world is the result, directly or indirectly, of war, to say nothing of the loss of life, of the anguish of the bereaved and the widows and orphans left without support. A part of the appropriations for war is made in advance of the obligations incurred, and to cut off and stop which you do not have to work a repudiation; but with pensions, appropriations are made for services performed, incurring the highest obligation resting on man, and which you can not deny without repudiating a debt of the most sacred character. [Applause.] Pensions are appropriations that go to the weak, to the helpless, to the disabled, to orphans, and to widows and are apportioned out in small sums to the many.

I, too, believe in economy, but I have no sympathy or admiration for those economists who first start to practice economy on the weak, the helpless, the widows, and the orphans. People who practice economy there show their lack of courage when they appear before the strong and the powerful, and their sacred convictions of economy fail them when they face large sums going to the few. These men appear periodically to oppose the appropriations that go to the weak, to the helpless, to the widows and orphans, and to those disabled. They do not appear when there are other appropriations before this House with the same courage and devotion to economy. Where are these men when the appropriations come before this House that pay the high salaries of officers who live in pomp and style? They are not here. They come on the floor of this House only when the weak and the helpless and widows and orphans are asking for a pittance for their loss. [Applause.] Where are these men when the appropriations for commutation for these officers are brought forward, for rent and light and heat, far in excess of the actual cost?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to get his time from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SELLS].

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-three minutes.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask where these gentlemen are when appropriations are before us for warships, for which we have no men to man and half the cost of which goes in profit to the trusts and monopolies? Where are these men when appropriations are before us for snobbish and aristocratic war colleges? Where are these gentlemen when these appropriations are made for vain and useless parade and display? Where are these men when appropriations come before this House in the form of extravagant retired pay? They lose their courage and sacred convictions of economy; but the very moment the weak and the helpless and the widows and the orphans appear here they go into a sort of hysteria and manifest all the symptoms of self-inflicted hydrophobia. [Applause and laughter.] I am opposed to war and hope soon to see the day when courts and tribunals will supplant force and might in the settlement of international disputes. But as long as war continues I will vote to relieve the victims of war, the maimed and disabled, the widows and orphans, by appropriations for pensions.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, it is more important to vote on this pension bill than it is to discuss it. I think its provisions are understood by the House; but I just want to say a word in reply to the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]. Some of the criticisms of the gentleman, in my judgment, are just, but he bases his argument upon two false conceptions, upon two wrong premises. In the first place, he has made it appear to this House and to the country that the Spanish-American War soldiers—able-bodied men—are being pensioned by the wholesale and without regard to merit. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that the same rules which apply to the pensioning of men who fought in the Civil War apply to the Spanish War veterans. They must have seen service and they must have been disabled in line of duty; they must be in needy circumstances. The same sort of examinations must be held for them as are held for the Civil War veterans.

Another theory of the gentleman's speech was this, that these men ought not to be pensioned unless they have seen long service in the war. I recognize the fact that men who went to war and fought the thing through and who saw service in many hard-fought battles ought to be pensioned more liberally than those who did not see such long service. But the theory of the Government, as I understand it, is to pension men who were disabled, whether they had gone through long service or not. At least they have shown their willingness to serve their country. They have volunteered for the purpose of defending the flag, and they have manifested a desire to maintain the honor and the integrity of this great country in all the wars it has ever had. [Applause.] It is not the fact, as the gentleman maintains, that these men had simply joined the Army for the purpose of getting pensions, as he says they did in the Spanish-American War. It was true many of them never got to the field of battle. He said they simply joined and went down and sat around an officer's camp, read detective stories, and took the officer's horse to water, and that then they came back and drew pensions for their service in the war. These men, by joining the Army, volunteered their services, and in doing that they manifested a desire to go out and fight the battles of their country and, if necessary, lose their lives in its defense; and the people of this great Nation recognize such loyalty and devotion, such patriotism, and it has been liberal, and justly so, in granting pensions to the men who have fought for the flag, as well as to their destitute widows and fatherless children.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. I will yield.

Mr. GORDON. But this bill does not pension any of the men who did the fighting or who enlisted.

Mr. POWERS. No; it does not do that; but it pensions the destitute widows of those soldiers. It pensions the widows who have no means of support. It pensions the widows of those men who died in destitute circumstances, and Mr. DIES in his speech argued long and forcefully to the House that these Spanish-American-War soldiers were being pensioned by the wholesale—able-bodied men, who had never seen service, who had nothing to do with the war one way or the other. I am trying to show wherein the argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] is both misleading and fallacious.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be notified when I have consumed 12 minutes, in order that I may yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS]. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall occupy all of the time which has been so generously yielded to me, but I wish to make some observations particularly in reference to some of the objections which have been made to the passage of this bill. I understood my friend from Texas [Mr. DIES], always eloquent and always classical and always interesting and sometimes accurate [laughter]—I understood him to express himself, in his own inimitable way, to this effect, that in this war there was not as severe fighting as there was in the Civil War; that the battles which were fought in the Spanish-American War were not comparable with the battles fought in the Civil War. Well, I think that is true so far as numbers of men engaged and the loss of life, and so forth, are concerned. I think that I recall that the gallant old soldier, my colleague from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], made a speech here in which he gave the figures that there was a heavier loss of life in the battle of Gettysburg than had been incurred in the Spanish-American and the Mexican Wars. That is the way I remember my colleague's statement.

Mr. SHERWOOD. And the War of the Revolution.

Mr. WILLIS. And the War of the Revolution, the gentleman says. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say you can not have war without having somebody on the other side. The reason we did not have great battles, the reason we did not have Pickett's charge, the reason we did not have battles like Chancellorsville and Malvern Hill and Chickamauga and Lookout Mountain was because we were not fighting the same kind of men in the Spanish-American War that we fought in the great war of 1861 to 1865. [Applause.] And it ought not to be charged against the Spanish-American soldiers that because there were no battles there as great as those I have named that therefore their widows' claims are not worthy. I am reminded in that connection of an incident that is told of Henry Ward Beecher, who was addressing a great audience at the time of the Civil War. That audience was hostile to the principles he was at that time advocating; out of the midst of the audience there arose a man who interrupted Mr. Beecher and said, "According to the statement you have made, you believe that the Union is eventually to prevail." He said, "How does it come that, after many months and years of fighting, the war still goes on?" Mr. Beecher, quick as lightning, turned upon his interrupter and said, "Let me say to my friend that the reason this war lasts and the reason we are fighting such tremendous battles, the reason it takes years to settle this contest is because we are fighting our own people, the best soldiers the world ever saw." [Applause.] He said, "My friend, if we were fighting an army made up of men like you, the rebellion would have been put down months ago." [Laughter and applause.] And that expresses the situation; that expresses the idea.

The reason why the Civil War was a tremendous conflict was because we were fighting our own people, and it ought not to be held up as a ground of objection by my eloquent friend from Texas or by other gentlemen that because we did not have the great battles in the Spanish-American War that we did in the Civil War that the claims of the widows and orphans of Spanish-American soldiers therefore are not worthy of consideration. But incidentally I want to suggest to the gentlemen this: That this Spanish-American War was no mere holiday affair. There was an untold amount of suffering in the fever camps of the South, in the Tropics, and on the battle field. It was not any little skirmish, as some gentleman has suggested. From my own State of Ohio in this war 219 men lost their lives by disease alone. In this whole country there was something like 4,000 men who lost their lives by disease, and according to the best reports I have been able to get, the total mortality of those wars involved in the terms of this bill was something like 12,000 men; it was not a mere holiday excursion.

On this point the committee report states:

Of the 434,000 who served in these warfares about one-fourth were in the regular service and from seventy-five to one hundred thousand were assigned to duty in the Philippine Islands. In these warfares there were 826 battles and skirmishes, in 515 of which men were killed or wounded. The whole mortality of the campaigns was 12,000 lives. For the first time in the history of our country the American soldier and sailor served in the Tropics and the Orient under climatic and hygienic conditions unusual to him. They received no bounty or substitute money, and were not drafted for service.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly; for a question.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The per cent of the mortality in the Spanish-American War was not as great as that of the service in this House per annum.

Mr. WILLIS. It is admitted that it takes heroic (?) men to serve in this House; but I will not discuss that ridiculous question. It takes a great deal of heroism and courage to serve here; we can not debate that question, as there would be absolute unanimity (?) of opinion; but I know my friend recognizes at any rate the great difference between service in this House at a large salary and service in our Army at a meager compensation, where a man makes a contract that he is to be put up to be shot at. There is an immense difference between those places.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Do you not favor pensioning these civil-service employees?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not at this time; but we will talk about that when we get to it. We are talking now about pensioning the widows and dependent children of Spanish-American soldiers, and I want my good, tall, handsome friend from Texas to sit down and receive instruction. I do not want to talk civil service. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are two or three reasons why it seems to me that this bill ought to receive favorable consideration. Here is one of them: In the first place, it is a comparatively easy matter for the soldier himself to obtain the evidence necessary for a proper consideration of his claim. He knows the names and addresses of his comrades. But when the critical hour comes, and that soldier goes into the great beyond, and the widow seeks to apply for a pension under the existing law, she has no means of obtaining the necessary evidence. And everybody who has had anything to do with cases at the Pension Bureau can bear out the truth of the statement that I have just made. That is the first proposition—the difficulty of obtaining evidence.

And then here is another proposition which it seems ought to appeal to all of us. It has been suggested here that the pension roll is simply a roll of graft, or perhaps the words "graft" and "corruption" were used—I am not sure about that. But I remember that the word "graft" was used. Now, Mr. Chairman, as calmly as I may, I want to repel that insinuation. I do not think that the American pension roll is now or ever has been, or ever will be, for that matter, a roll of graft or dishonor.

The gentlemen who are opposing this bill say that it is not desirable that pensions should be granted to widows and dependent children. I have a case in mind, brought to my attention just a few weeks ago, and I put it to the gentlemen and want them to think about it. They say they are in favor of pensioning the men with scars upon their bodies, and yet these gentlemen, when such bills are pending to pension those very men, of course, without exception, have voted against the bills.

Mr. CALLAWAY. There has not been a bill of that kind before the House since you and I have been here.

Mr. WILLIS. I will not discuss that question with the gentleman. He knows my views on the pension question and I know his. I hope he will allow me to proceed. I do not agree at all with the statement he has just made. However, I am talking about this pending bill.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] yield to his colleague?

Mr. WILLIS. I do.

Mr. GORDON. Can you tell us what this bill will cost the people of this country?

Mr. WILLIS. No; not exactly; and nobody else on earth can definitely do so.

Mr. GORDON. Do you not consider that an objection to it?

Mr. WILLIS. I consider that an objection to any piece of legislation we pass. It is impossible to tell in advance exactly what the effects of any law will be. When you voted for a tariff bill that was leading this country to the precipice of business disaster you did not know how much it was going to cost the Government. We can see that it is costing the Government and the people enough, but the gentleman did not decline to vote for it for that reason. [Applause on the Republican side.] I can only give an estimate as to what this bill will probably cost. The estimate given in the report is $2,500,000 per annum. The estimate of the Secretary of the Interior is as follows:

The number of claims filed by widows and dependents based upon service during the Spanish War and the Philippine insurrection is 14,614; and the number of widows and dependents who have been granted pensions on account of such service, 7,122. The number of widows on the roll on account of the service above named on June 30, 1911, was 1,217, and the number of minor children 326. The number of widows' claims which have been rejected is 4,705. In the number rejected there are no doubt included many claims which have been rejected the second or third time, upon the submission of additional evidence; so that the actual number of rejections would be somewhat less than that given.

From statistics gathered from various sources as to the average number of marriages each year and the ascertained death rates at certain ages, it is estimated that the number of widows and minors who would probably be entitled to pension under this bill, should it be enacted into law, would be between 10,000 and 15,000. If the number should be as high as 15,000, the cost of the bill would be approximately $2,500,000 per annum within a few years after the passage thereof. It is evident, however, that the cost would increase from year to year for a number of years, on account of the death of those who rendered service—who would leave widows and minor children surviving who would be entitled to pension under the proposed act.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIS. Let me answer one at a time.

My own opinion, based upon such investigations as I have been able to make, is that that estimate is probably too high. I think that $1,500,000 would be nearer the truth for the first year; but undoubtedly it will increase somewhat as time passes; nobody can tell with certainty. The Pension Office does not have at this time any figures upon which they can base more than a mere guess.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CALLAWAY. There are 486,000 of these veterans. Can not the gentleman figure it in an easy way, from the pensions granted heretofore, that every one of them will have a widow, and each widow will have a pension?

Mr. WILLIS. We can not tell how many will come under the terms of the bill, because we can not know how many of these soldiers will die leaving widows.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman ever been able to find out yet why it is that when a man and a woman are married the man always dies first? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. That is a proposition of which I had not thought.

Mr. MANN. It shows how absurd such propositions are.

Mr. WILLIS. It is utterly impossible for the Commissioner of Pensions or any other officer to estimate what proportion will come within the limitation provided in this bill as to the annual income of $250.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has consumed 12 minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a portion of a statement that I made before the committee when this bill was under consideration, which statement has not been printed in the committee hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, in closing I hope this House will do an act of simple, patriotic justice and pass this bill for the relief of the dependent widows and children of Spanish-American veterans. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Under the leave granted, I desire to add here the statement made by me before the Committee on Pensions on February 7, 1914, when this and other similar bills were under consideration.

"Mr. WILLIS. It is not necessary to go into an analysis of the bill which I introduced or any particular bill, because I assume that all these bills cover substantially the same ground. They contemplate the granting of a pension—usually $12 a month—to the widows of Spanish-American War veterans where the marriage occurs prior to the passage of this act. These several bills also provide for a pension of $2 a month for the minor children, and some of the bills contain a limitation that the pension shall be granted only in case the annual income of the widow from all sources does not exceed $250. Not all the bills contain that provision.

"Now, recurring to the bill which I introduced. Without burdening the committee with any lengthy statement, I will say that I introduced a bill in the last Congress—H. R. 12816, July 26, 1911—which was variously discussed and was indorsed by many organizations of Spanish-American War veterans, including the Spanish-American War veterans of Ohio. As Mr. Stone stated last night, it, with others, was considered in the framing of the Crago bill in the last Congress.

"Mr. KEY. Mr. WILLIS, in what particular does your bill differ from the Crago bill?

"Mr. WILLIS. I think, Mr. Chairman, the only difference, as I recall it, is this: The Crago bill contains the $250 limitation as to the amount of income. The bill that I prepared did not contain that.

"Mr. KEY. I also refer to the other bill that you have recently introduced. Do you refer to your first bill?

"Mr. WILLIS. There is no difference in the two bills. The bill which I introduced in this Congress on April 7, 1913, H. R. 1778, is the same as the bill I introduced in the previous Congress.

"Mr. SELLS. There is another difference between your bill and the Crago bill, and that is the amount of the attorney's fee. The Crago bill says $5 and your bill says $10.

"Mr. WILLIS. Perhaps the Crago bill is better in that respect. I prepared this bill from an examination of nothing else but the general pension law, which provides an attorney's fee of $10, but it may be that $5 is sufficient. I gave the Crago bill my hearty support in the last Congress. Col. Crago was a Spanish-American War soldier, and he was on this committee.

"Now, the members of the committee are familiar with the arguments in favor of legislation of this kind. I need only to refer to them. Here is the first one that occurs to me. It is now 15 years since the close of the Spanish-American War. It is very significant to me that no organization of Spanish-American War veterans up to the present time has ever asked anything for itself; they come under the general pension law and they are content. During the time I have been in Congress I have never had a letter from a Spanish-American War soldier asking for the amendment of any pension law in his behalf. What they are now seeking is an amendment to the law to give to their widows and orphans the right which is now enjoyed by the widows and orphans of veterans of the Civil War and the Indian wars, and to me that is highly commendable, because they are not trying to get something for themselves but for those who are helpless and dependent upon them. Then there is another reason, and this has probably occurred to all the members of the committee in dealing with pension cases. It is a comparatively easy thing for the soldier himself to get his testimony. He knows who his comrades were, and perhaps knows where some of them are. But when the fatal hour comes, and the soldier is gone, his widow does not know where to find his comrades, and the result is that it is very difficult for her to obtain her evidence. I have had that brought out very strongly in a number of cases.

"Now, it seems to me that one of these bills—which one I do not care—should be passed. I have no pride of authorship; I will say that. I am gratified to know that I have been active along this line of work, but whether my bill is reported or somebody else's bill it makes no difference; but we want some action.

"Mr. KEY. You want results?

"Mr. WILLIS. We want results, and any one of these bills will give relief. I have had two or three cases recently to which I want to call your attention. I suppose they are typical. No doubt you have all had similar cases.

"Mr. KEY. Mr. WILLIS, I would like to ask you a question before you leave that point. I would like to have your views relative to the fees allowed pension agents. I receive quite a number of letters from pension agents and attorneys—regular attorneys, too—who have become interested in cases and have to draw up papers for widows, and in a great many instances they claim that $5 is inadequate, especially if there has been a little trouble with the case.

"Mr. WILLIS. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is only fair to say that the bill which I introduced in this Congress almost the first day of the Congress provides for a fee of $10, and, as I said a little while ago in response to an inquiry by Mr. SELLS, it is possible that the provision of the Crago bill, namely, $5, is sufficient, because there is not very much to prove. It is not like proving up a pension case under the old law. If my bill—H. R. 1778—or any of the other bills before us should become law, the only thing necessary to prove is that the soldier was honorably discharged, that he served the proper time, and that the marriage occurred and continued.

"Mr. SELLS. That is the only fact to prove—the fact of the marriage. The rest can be gotten from the war records.

"Mr. WILLIS. Precisely; that is true.

"Mr. KEATING. Have you any information as to the probable cost of this legislation; that is, in the beginning?

"Mr. WILLIS. Well, somewhat. With the permission of the committee I will refer to the report on the Crago bill in the last Congress. Without burdening the record with all that is stated here I call attention to these figures in paragraph 4 on page 3:

"From statistics gathered from various sources as to the average number of marriages each year and the ascertained death rates at certain ages, it is estimated that the number of widows and minors who would probably be entitled to pension under this bill, should it be enacted into law, would be between 10,000 and 15,000. If the number should be as high as 15,000, the cost of the bill would be approximately $2,500,000 per annum within a few years after the passage thereof. It is evident, however, that the cost would increase from year to year for a number of years on account of the death of those who rendered service who would leave widows and minor children surviving, who would be entitled to pension under the proposed act.

"Now, I think, Mr. KEATING, that that is an extremely liberal estimate. I do not think that H. R. 1778 or any other of these bills would entail that heavy expense. My personal opinion is that the first year or the second year—because it will take that long to get the thing started—the expense will be not to exceed $1,500,000. In my judgment, that is a very liberal estimate. In fact, this committee, which gave very careful consideration to this subject in the last Congress, gave its estimate, on page 2 of this report, that the amount would not exceed $100,000 per annum; but I think that was too low.

"Mr. KEY. That was only the estimate of the members of the committee; that was not an estimate secured from the Interior Department.

"Mr. WILLIS. Oh, no; that was simply the individual estimate of the members of the committee. I think we would be safe in saying that the expense entailed would be $1,500,000.

"Now, as illustrative of the need for legislation of this kind, let me call your attention to several cases. I had one case called to my attention in a city of the eighth district when I was there recently. I was asked to go to a certain home where there was a Spanish-American soldier's widow. They wanted me to see whether I could make some arrangement about getting a pension for her. I went there, in company with some other persons, and there I found the mother and three little children living in circumstances of the most abject poverty. The children looked hungry, cold, scantily clad, and the mother appeared to be suffering from tuberculosis. At any rate, she is not a strong woman. She is taking in washing, but she is not able to do the amount of work that she previously did, because her health is too poor. Were it not for the fact that some neighbors and comrades of the Spanish-American War are contributing to help them out, this widow and these little children, the children of a man who fought under the flag, a soldier of unimpeachable record, would be in the poorhouse. They are now in want, and I think that is a disgrace. It ought never to be allowed.

"Mr. KEY. Was the soldier a pensioner?

"Mr. WILLIS. Well, I am not sure at this moment whether he was or not.

"Mr. KEY. It is not material.

"Mr. WILLIS. I can look up the papers and find out. At all events, the soldier did not die of disease incurred or wounds received in the service, and his widow can not get a pension at all. Incidentally, there is a special bill for her relief pending before this committee, but that bill is not before the committee to-night.

"There is another case, a very peculiar case, I have in mind. A man fought in the Spanish-American War, a splendid soldier with an excellent record. In the service he contracted a fever. After the war was over he was discharged. I think he drew some pension, but he did not get along very well. He was in a weakened condition; he soon became melancholy, and finally his mind became affected. He was worried over his condition and it affected his mind. One day when he was shaving, weak and trembling, for some reason or other—whether because of his unsteady condition or because of hallucination—he cut too deep and cut his throat. I took up that case and investigated it. Now, I am not criticizing the bureau, because I think they acted fairly, but the Commissioner of Pensions, after a most careful investigation, held—and, I suppose, correctly, under existing law—that it could not properly be said that that man died of disease incurred or wounds received in the service. The cause of death was only speculative. Consequently they could not grant a pension to his widow, and unless a special bill is introduced for her relief and passed, she is out in the cold.

"Now, there are hundreds of cases like these all over the country, and therefore I believe, gentlemen, that patriotic public opinion of this country will sustain this Congress, if it takes up some one of these bills and enacts it into law.

"Mr. SELLS. Your bill eliminates that clause in the Crago bill with reference to the $250 income of a widow?

"Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. SELLS. Now, of course, there is nothing in the general law applicable to the widows of Civil War veterans touching their income?

"Mr. WILLIS. No.

"Mr. SELLS. Why should that restriction be placed on incomes of the widows of Spanish War veterans?

"Mr. WILLIS. My own opinion is that it ought not to be. I drew this bill without having seen any other bill drawn for the same purpose, and I drew it along the line of the general laws applicable to widows of Civil War veterans. Whereas at one time there was a limitation of $250, it does not now exist. Personally, I should like to have that left out, but the legislative committee of the Spanish-American-War veterans, in conjunction with various Members of Congress, took up my bill in connection with various others. They considered all the bills and finally recommended the Crago bill, containing the $250 limitation. While I did not think it ought to be in there, I did not oppose it.

"Mr. SELLS. Would it not add very greatly to the work of administering the law?

"Mr. WILLIS. Undoubtedly so; and that is a question to be considered in connection with the suggestion of the Chair a while ago.

"Now, if you are going to put in that $250 limitation, it becomes a very much more difficult matter to get your rights established. It may be that if you leave in that $250 limitation the attorney's fee ought to be left at $10, because of the greater amount of work it would entail.

"Mr. SELLS. Does that limitation apply to a gross or a net income?

"Mr. WILLIS. I have not paid much attention to that feature of it. Have you a copy of another bill on the same subject?

"Mr. KEATING. I have a bill here which says 'net income.'

"Mr. WILLIS. That is it; net income.

"Mr. KEY. When the Civil War widows were younger, did not the act of June 27 apply to cases of that kind?

"Mr. WILLIS. I do not remember when the limitation as to income was stricken out. I do know that for a long time it was in the law. No doubt Mr. Cobb knows.

"Mr. KEY. When was that, Mr. Cobb?

"Mr. COBB. From 1890 they were limited to about $100 per annum net income aside from their 'daily labor,' as it said. If they had more than $100 they were not dependent. If they had an income of less than $100, the Secretary held that they were dependent. That ran from June, 1890, to May, 1900, when Congress got tired of it and passed the act of May 1, 1900, making the limitation $250 net income. That ran until 1908, when it was stricken out altogether.

"Mr. KEY. In the event that that feature should be stricken from the bill, how many additional pensions would be granted? In other words, how many pensions would that keep out? Have you any idea along that line?

"Mr. WILLIS. I have a very faint idea. It is only speculative, and might not be of any benefit at all. Let me call the attention of the Chair to the estimate or conjecture made by the Committee on Pensions in the last Congress on that very point. The committee said:

> "What percentage of these come within the purview of the bill—that is, have no means of support other than their daily labor, etc.—can only be conjectured. However, if it be assumed that about one-fifth of these are in this limited destitute class, appropriation will have to be made for about 800 widows and their orphans.

"In other words, they estimate that there would be one-fifth of the total number of 4,000 widows who would come under this act. My own opinion, Mr. Chairman, is that there would be a larger number than that. I should say that one-third would probably be nearer the number; but that, as I suggested, is only a mere conjecture.

"Mr. KEATING. Was that estimate of $2,500,000 based on that conjecture?

"Mr. WILLIS. No, sir; that was the estimate made by the Secretary of the Interior on the theory that the number would be as high as 15,000.

"Mr. KEATING. That is, if there were no limitation, as in this bill?

"Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir. So that the two estimates are on a different basis.

"Mr. KEY. Then, in your opinion, one-third of all the Spanish-American-War widows should have a net income of $250 a year?

"Mr. WILLIS. No; probably two-thirds would have incomes in excess of $250, and one-third would be within that limitation. The committee estimated the percentage at one-fifth in the last Congress. My own opinion is that that is too low an estimate. If it is appropriate, I should like to ask Mr. Cobb his opinion.

"Mr. KEY. Certainly.

"Mr. COBB. The number of dependent widows can not be ascertained from the figures given by the commissioner in his estimate. He estimates the total number of widows, and from that number no one in the world can tell how many are dependent and how many independent. I think you are right in saying that at least one-third would be dependent. I think that is a fairer average. Perhaps there would be a greater per cent pensionable. There is no way to positively determine just exactly the correct per cent who would be entitled to a pension under this act.

"Mr. SELLS. This estimate given out by the Commissioner of Pensions not only embraces the original applications, but applications for reopenings.

"Mr. COBB. He takes the maximum of all claims filed.

"Mr. WILLIS. That is why I say that his estimate of $2,500,000 is extremely liberal.

"Mr. SELLS. Mr. WILLIS, I would like to ask you how you regard pensions. Do you regard them as the payment of a just debt due the soldier or his widow, or as an act of charity on the part of the Government?

"Mr. WILLIS. Well, my theory of pensions is this: That it is not at all an act of charity. When I get a pension claim through the Pension Bureau I do not think of it at all as a charitable act. When I am aiding an old soldier to get a pension or participating in general pension legislation I feel that I am simply doing what I can to pay a debt which this Government owes to its defenders. That is the way I look at pensions.

"Mr. SELLS. Then, if it is the payment of a debt, why should we attempt to make a limitation in its application to widows receiving $250 per annum net income?

"Mr. WILLIS. I do not think we should. That is a very cogent argument. Personally, I do not think there should be any limitation.

"Mr. SELLS. Does not the attempt to limit it suggest that it is a mere work of charity in which the Government is engaged?

"Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir. To be fair with Col. Crago and the members of the committee, I rather suspect that they put that limitation in there not because they wanted it there but because they feared that if it was not there there might be opposition in the House. Personally, I would rather take my chances with the opposition and fight it out on the floor with the limitation left out, but that is a matter to be left in the wisdom of the committee.

"Mr. KEY. Is there anything further you care to say on your bill, Mr. WILLIS?

"Mr. WILLIS. I think not, Mr. Chairman. The general features of my bill are about the same as are found in all these bills. Naturally, I think it is a mighty good bill. It has been indorsed by thousands of Spanish-American-War veterans, but there are other bills which contain the same provisions.

"Mr. KEY. All of these bills are substantially the same?

"Mr. WILLIS. Oh, I assume that is the case, although I have not looked over all of them. As I say, this bill was worked out when I first came here, and the other gentlemen worked out their bills along the same line. I should be very happy, indeed, if the committee should take up H. R. 1778 and recommend it, but if they do not do that and take up some other bill they will find me on the firing line on the floor just as I was in the last Congress. Col. Crago's bill was just as good as mine, and there was no conflict about it. But whatever bill is recommended by this committee, I will be on the ground just as I was before, fighting for the principles embodied in all these bills. I am very grateful, gentlemen, for the hearing you have accorded me.

"Mr. KEY. We thank you for your statement, and I know it will be helpful to us in arriving at some conclusion, and I regret exceedingly that we were unable to hear the gentlemen last night."

I also add a copy of H. R. 1778, introduced by me on April 7, 1913. This bill is the same as H. R. 12816, which I introduced in the House during the Sixty-second Congress on July 26, 1911:

A bill (H. R. 1778) to provide for pensions to widows and minor children of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the War with Spain.

Be it enacted, etc., That if any officer or enlisted man in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States who served 90 days or more during the War with Spain or Philippine insurrection, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed upon the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood: Provided, That said widow shall have married said soldier prior to passage of this act; and said widow shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability.

SEC. 2. That no claim agent or attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claims under the provisions of this act, shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive for such services in preparing or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only upon the order of the Commissioner of Pensions by the pension agent making payment of the pension allowed, and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension, or any part of a pension claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I understand this bill is for the relief of destitute widows of Spanish-American-War soldiers In any case, a civilized community must take care, somehow or other, of its destitute people. In any case those same people would become, in some shape or other, a public charge.

Now, then, it has been the policy of this country ever since we have had soldiers to put the widows of those soldiers upon an honor roll and take care of them, to an extent at least, in the way of pensions; and this bill simply extends such policy to the widows of soldiers of the Spanish-American War.

I have had some acquaintance with the circumstances attending service in that campaign, which has been regarded as an opéra bouffe war with Spain. I know of a regiment that went into that service—strong, stalwart, hearty young men. They went through the service, and after the war was over they were quartered in a pestilential camp, and within three weeks, although they had no sickness at the end of the war, 46 per cent of that whole command was in hospital at one time; and that regiment came home from the service yellow, wan, and emaciated. I know of my personal knowledge at least 60 or 70 men of that regiment who have never been able to do a stroke of work since, through physical disability. During their service of some seven months they lost by death and wounds 5 per cent of their strength, and within 60 days after their discharge they lost 5 per cent more by death.

I have in mind a case in which a stalwart, handsome young fellow went out in that regiment. He was taken sick with malarial fever, or something of that sort. His dependent mother, who was a seamstress, failed of his support. He grew continually worse until he was sent to an insane asylum, and there died. That poor woman has nothing in the world to support her, and under the law as it is at present she is unable to get a pension, for the reason that the friends of this boy can not trace back his illness as incident to his service with sufficient assurance to satisfy the department.

I have in mind another case where a widow with an imbecile child and another young child was unable to secure a pension because of the lack of a law like this. She is the widow of a soldier who served in the Spanish war. He came home and took sick and died, and that woman is struggling along as a washerwoman crippled with rheumatism, and has no other support.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that a bill of this sort, where it is proposed to put on the honor roll the destitute widows of soldiers who went out in time of war at the call of the President and took their chances of whatever might befall, and who came home impaired in health and died, should be passed. The widows of such men who are now in indigent circumstances should be taken care of by the passage of a bill of this kind. Twelve dollars a month is a beggarly stipend. I think it ought to be increased to three or four times that amount. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I shall not occupy very much of the time of the committee in discussing this bill. From the standpoint of my own personal welfare and from the political viewpoint it might be well that I keep silent, but I can not consult my own personal welfare when confronted with this bill.

I regret very much that this is one pension bill to which I can not give my loyal support. In my judgment, and from my view of the theory upon which pensions are granted, this bill is indefensible. I hope to be able to put into the RECORD a few of the things which justify my viewpoint upon this measure.

I am in favor of meritorious pensions for our soldiers, and in taking the position that I do upon this question this evening I would not detract one thing nor take from a single meritorious pension claim its right to receive careful consideration and favorable action, no matter if it be general legislation or special pension bills. In the first place, it is conceded, and confessedly admitted, that an amendment is put in there for the purpose of enabling the widows of something like 3,000 soldiers and 90 officers to get a pension which they can not get to-day under the law of the land. That law of the land is construed by the Department of the Interior, and its decision is as binding in questions of this kind as the decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States upon general laws. The amendment to which I refer reads as follows:

Service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, including all furloughs.

Under that provision a man may not have been in camp 30 days. He may have been mustered in and mustered out, and during the period of 90 days he may have been furloughed back home for 60 days, sleeping in his own bed, living with his own family, contracting no disease whatever; and yet under the provisions of this bill his wife can procure a pension at the rate of $12 a month in the event of his death, and he may have contracted his sickness while at home.

What is the theory upon which we grant pensions to the soldiers of this country? Some one has said, and it has been repeated on the floor of this House time and time again, that the theory upon which pensions are granted is that it enables our country to do away with a tremendous standing Army. Yet we have 77,000 men to-day in our standing Army, and in addition to this our State militia, to which our Government annually contributes hundreds of thousands for maintenance, thereby bringing our Army up to practically 240,000 men, and between 45,000 and 50,000 enlisted men in our Navy. So when I see the standing Army forging on and on near the 240,000 mark that argument falls to the ground with me, the number of men in our standing Army mounting higher and higher all the time, and our pension roll soaring higher and higher all the time, the argument that a liberal pension system keeps down a standing Army, too, falls to the ground.

I believe that the theory upon which pensions should be granted is that the Government ought to return to its soldiers that which it has taken from them. I believe the highest duty that a man owes upon earth is to those who are dependent upon him for support and maintenance, be it wife and children, father or mother.

Now, if the Government takes the services of a man from his family, and if in his service for the Government he loses an arm, loses a limb, contracts a disease which prevents him from earning a livelihood for the support and maintenance of his family, I believe the Government should pension him, give back to him or those dependent upon him the equivalent of that which it took from him, and I believe this is the true theory upon which pensions ought to be granted. Whatever we have taken from the individual in time of war, or even in time of peace, in order to maintain war or to maintain peace, if we have taken from the individual that which belongs to him, be it his life, his limb, or his general pursuit of happiness, as far as we possibly can we ought to remunerate him in return in the way of a pension.

As has been argued here, this bill may reach at least a few important cases, but it goes too far. If to-day a woman marries a man who served in the Spanish War, under the provisions of this bill the moment he dies she can procure a pension of $12 a month, even though his services in the war may not have shortened his life one moment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Provided——

Mr. COX. What is the proviso?

Mr. MURDOCK. Provided her annual income is not $250.

Mr. COX. Oh, yes; but the gentleman knows there is always a way to get around that.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman knows no such thing.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has been here in Congress long enough to know that that does not amount to anything whatever and will not amount to anything.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. I yield for a question; yes.

Mr. MANN. It would furnish a great deal of help to many Members of the House if the gentleman would tell how they get around that. I have run up against it a good many times and have never learned how to get around it. If the gentleman knows, will he, in a single sentence, tell us how it can be done?

Mr. COX. There is always a way to get around those things. There is no question about that.

Mr. PAYNE. How do you do it?

Mr. COX. I do not do it at all, but they do it themselves.

Mr. MURDOCK. The way to answer that is for the gentleman to say that he is not a pension attorney.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the bad features in this bill are, in my opinion, that it will pension many widows from whom the Government has never taken anything in the first instance, and from whose husbands it has not taken anything. It has not shortened their lives nor has it destroyed their limbs nor lessened their earning capacity. It has not taken their lives or limbs. It has not destroyed their health. It has not injured their power or ability to earn a livelihood.

And yet, under the provisions of this bill, without reference to the fact as to whether or not he contracted any sickness or injury in the line of duty, the bare fact that he enlisted for 90 days—perchance three-quarters of that time sent back home on a furlough—the moment he dies, that moment his widow can call for a pension of $12 a month and get it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that Civil War veterans' widows never had a pension on these liberal terms until after the act that put all the old soldiers over 62 years of age on the roll?

Mr. COX. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. COX. I do not know just when the $8 act was first passed, but it is true that for years following the Civil War the widow of the Civil War soldier could not get a pension unless she was able to establish that her husband died as the result of a wound or disease contracted in line of duty. Just when the act was passed granting the widow $8 a month I do not remember; but I do know that for years and years following the Civil War the widows of the Civil War soldiers only drew $8 a month, and it was not until 1908 that Congress recognized the right, duty, and obligation to widows of the Civil War soldiers and increased their pension from $8 to $12 a month. At that time these old women had practically reached the age of three score and ten years, unable to go out and earn a living. They had performed their duty in life. Not so with the class of widows we are seeking to pension here. They are young and able to work. And yet to-day, under the law as it is, a woman marrying a Civil War soldier after 1890 is not entitled to a pension unless she can show that her husband died as the result of wounds, sickness, or disease contracted by him in the line of duty. Although she may have married him immediately after the act was passed, and for 20 years or more have nursed the old soldier in his declining days, she is without relief.

There are two times in the life of all of us when we need care and assistance—one in childhood and the second when we become old, sick, and infirm. Now, you are putting these young women ahead of this class of women, and, in my judgment, the woman who marries a Civil War soldier after 1890 has a much more meritorious claim on Congress than the woman who marries a Spanish War soldier young and in good health to-day.

I do not believe in another provision in this bill. I do not believe that it can be maintained or defended, and that is the proviso in the bill which reads:

Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act.

Now, it may be true that on society's shoulders fall the necessities of taking care of the indigent, but I am afraid, gentlemen, we are doing the wrong thing, that we are building up to a large extent a dependent class of people in this country instead of an independent class. I believe that a majority of men who join the Regular Army to-day and a majority of men who enter the Navy to-day do it with the hope and with the avowed purpose of getting a sick discharge, if possible, and drawing a pension as soon as they possibly can.

I believe that we have reached the limit on the pension question. As I said a while ago, when I turn to the old Civil War soldier, I am in favor of liberal pensions. They are infirm, and they deserve it, and I stand ready at any and all times to vote any reasonable pension to that class of old soldiers. When you come to compare the hardships and trials and tribulations of the soldiers that went through the Civil War with the trials and tribulations of soldiers that went through the Spanish War, there is no comparison. There is no rule by which to measure it. Who has stood for a moment on the battle fields of Gettysburg, of Vicksburg, of Shiloh, of Chickamauga, and not realized that the men who struggled there were struggling for a principle on both sides, the North and the South? Who for a moment thinks that the men who went through that struggle came out of it as strong as they went into it? In my judgment, the men on both sides of that great contest, the North and the South, who went into the war from one to four years came out of it disabled men; even though not shot with bullets and shells, yet no man could stand that awful strain for four years and come out as healthy as when he went in. Coming out of it disabled men, in my judgment the Government should give them back that which it took from them—their ability to earn a living.

Three thousand men we propose to take care of in this bill, counting the time on furlough. Is there any merit in it? It is true we do not propose to take care of the men themselves, but we propose to take care of widows of this class of soldiers.

As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] well said to some gentleman on the other side, there is no power on earth that can resist the pressure of the 430,000 Spanish War soldiers the moment this becomes a law. They will immediately begin a campaign for an age-pension law. There is none here, in my judgment, able to resist the pressure when they come and ask for an age-pension law. Our old soldiers coming out of the Civil War struggled along from 1865 to 1890, and during that period of time, before they were permitted to draw a pension, they had to establish by proof that they contracted sickness, wounds, or disease in the line of duty, and it was not until the act of 1890 that even that class of men could get a pension in this country without showing that they had contracted a disease in line of duty. It was not until 1907, forty-odd years after the war, that Congress passed an age-pension law. It was not until 1912 that that law was amended, liberalized, and the old soldiers given a chance to draw larger pensions. Here we are from the very start proposing to give to the widows of Spanish War soldiers a pension of $12 a month, without regard whatever as to whether the soldier contracted any sickness or disease in line of duty.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. DIES. Take the case of a widow of a Civil War soldier, who fought with Gen. Meade at Gettysburg and who died 15 years after the war was over, but whose death was not the result of injuries received in service. Would his widow have been entitled to a pension as now provided for in this bill?

Mr. COX. I do not think so. This bill simply opens up the floodgates without any regard to whether or not the Government crippled any of these 430,000 and odd soldiers. It opens up the floodgates to put that number of women on the pension rolls. I do not believe the country would approve of it if it thoroughly understood the question. I am willing to take my chances in explaining it to my people back home, if I am assailed on this question, as I expect I will be. Somebody must pay the bills. There is no question about that. Some controversy has been up here as to what it is going to cost. Nobody yet has ventured an opinion, and he is a wise man who refuses to venture an opinion of what the cost is going to be, because no one can tell. No one has any means of knowing, but reasoning from the past to the future, reasoning from cause to effect, we do know that if this bill becomes a law it is going to add a tremendous amount to the pension rolls of this country; aye, millions upon millions of dollars annually. As was said by my colleague from Indiana [Mr. GRAY], 70 per cent of the total revenues of this Government to-day out of the eight hundred and some odd million dollars raised by taxation, in some way, directly or indirectly, goes for the support of war in some manner, either in the way of pensions or of maintaining great armies and great navies. Seventy per cent of the taxes laid upon the people of this country goes because of war in some way or in some manner. Is not it too much?

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill because I do not believe that it has valid merit in it, because it proposes to pension, in my judgment, a large number of women in this country without any regard whatever to whether their husbands were ever injured while in line of duty. If a soldier was injured in line of duty, I would not deny a pension to his widow. I would not deny her a pension of $12 a month. I would willingly grant it, but I oppose granting a pension to anybody unless it can be shown that the Government injured the person, on account of whom the pension is granted, in some way, in some manner, somehow, by exacting his services in defense of his country.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. GORDON. In the circumstances just referred to, to wit, that the injury must have been incurred in the service, all those cases are taken care of by the general law, are they not?

Mr. COX. I understand they are. I understand that widows of Spanish War soldiers, when the husband died as a result of wounds, sickness, or disease contracted by him in the line of duty, are entitled to pensions at the rate of $12 per month. That is the same rule that operated upon the widows of the Civil War soldiers for years and years after that great war was over.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It operated until 1900, did it not?

Mr. GORDON. Eighteen hundred and ninety, was it not?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; 1900. Did any widow of a Civil War veteran have any pensionable status unless her husband had a pensionable status at the date of his death?

Mr. COX. I think probably the act of 1890 gave the widow $8 a month without regard to whether her husband died of wounds and sickness contracted in line of duty. That was 25 years after the war of 1861, so the widows of the soldiers of that war had to wait 25 years before they were ever granted a pension, without regard to whether or not the husband contracted the sickness in line of duty.

Why, within about 15 years after that little skirmish is over we propose to open up the floodgates and give to the widow of every soldier in that war who was enlisted for 90 days or more a pension of $12 a month.

Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I will.

Mr. ELDER. Does not the gentleman suppose the mere fact that very few were injured in the war or could show any actual trouble accruing from the Spanish-American War, as they could on the other hand in the Civil War, accounts for the present status of this bill to-day?

Mr. COX. That might be true. Just how many soldiers of the Spanish War are on the pension rolls to-day I do not know. My understanding is it is between 26,000 and 28,000, and our pension laws are liberal—extraordinarily so. There is hardly a hard and fast pension law upon the statute books of the United States to-day. Under the law, if a man or woman is entitled to a pension, they can ordinarily get the proof to maintain it. There is not much difficulty, in my judgment, for the wife of a Civil War veteran to get proof established that her husband, who faced shot and shell for four years, if he was injured, contracted his disability in the line of duty. Mr. Chairman, while I regret in some way that I can not bring my mind to support this measure, I can not, because I do not believe that it is based upon merit. I believe that we propose to give money here to a class of people many, many of whom the Government never took anything from in the first instance. Why, I know Spanish-American War soldiers in my county who were in that little scrap three months, four months, as strong, able-bodied people after they came home as when they went out. They are not claiming a pension; they have never made any demand upon me for it at all. They admit they were not hurt, were not injured. Is it right, Mr. Chairman, for us to give to their widows a pension? I say not. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, so far as this question of furlough is concerned, it is liable to arouse considerable dissatisfaction among the soldiers of the Civil War if the soldiers of the Spanish-American War are given an advantage over the veteran soldiers of 1861 to 1865. For instance, it has been held by the Pension Office as far back as I can remember, or ever since the age-pension law was passed in February, 1907, that a soldier who was absent from his command on furlough had that time deducted from his service; and ever since the so-called Sherwood pension bill was passed, which is a bill based upon both age and service, it has been the universal rule of the Pension Office to deduct from every soldier's service the time that he was on furlough.

We have before us now in the Committee on Invalid Pensions a large number of applications for private pensions of soldiers who served 89 days, 85 days, 87 days. I have a soldier from my own district who went home one day before he had served 90 days, and he can not get a pension on that account. Now, if we give the soldiers of the Spanish War an advantage over the soldiers of the Civil War, it is going to create great dissatisfaction among the old veterans of the Civil War. Another thing: So far as the widows' pensions are concerned, if the widow of a soldier of the War of 1861–1865 lost her companion and she remarried another soldier after the 27th of June, 1890, and that soldier dies, she can not be restored to the rolls as a pensioner until she proves that her first husband died from wounds or disease contracted in the war. Now, this bill, it seems to me, although I intend to support it, should have those two provisions amended so as to place the soldiers of the Spanish War on an equality, but give them no advantage over the soldiers of the Civil War.

What I desire to talk about now for a few moments is the bill which I introduced in the House January 23 for a medal-of-honor roll. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. HAY, of Virginia, has introduced a bill on the same lines for a medal-of-honor roll for the soldiers of the future. My bill takes care of the soldiers of the past and is framed upon exactly the same basis. We have had our hearings on this bill, and it has been unanimously reported and will be placed on the calendar in the near future. I desire now to reply to some remarks which were made in this debate early this afternoon by the able and distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

You all remember, those of the older membership, when the so-called dollar-a-day bill was under debate, it was universally claimed by the opponents of that measure that it would cost $75,000,000. The amendments made to the bill in the Senate reduced the amount about $12,000,000, and when that bill came back to the House and went into conference, I made an estimate then, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show it, that the bill would not cost over $21,000,000. Now, you take the official report of the Commissioner of Pensions for 1912–13, and you will find—referring to the soldiers of the Civil War—that the increase was $20,851,583. That was within $148,417 of the estimate made by me on the floor of the House. I said to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], who was in charge of the pension appropriation bill last year when it was under debate in the Committee of the Whole, that he could reduce that bill $5,000,000 and then have enough money to pay pensions. He asked me to make that reduction in an amendment. I said I would not do so, because I was not going to put my judgment against the judgment of that committee. What are the facts? There was a surplus or unexpended balance of $5,348,215.

Now, this medal of honor bill will not cost to exceed $12,250 the first year, all told, and if we can expend $400,000 to exterminate parasite ticks from the backs of Texas steers, I do not think any Member ought to object to $12,000 for the heroes who can win medals of honor in battle.

Intrepidity and valor in battle and on the firing line have not received that high recognition to which we believe it is entitled. Therefore I propose to create an "Army and Navy medal-of-honor roll," upon which may be written the name of every surviving soldier who has served in any war of the United States, having attained the age of 65, and who has been awarded a medal of honor for having "in action involving actual conflict with an enemy distinguished himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity, at the risk of his life, above and beyond the call of duty."

The place of a brigadier general in battle is in the center and rear of his command. If a brigadier general draws his sword and charges on the line of bayonets with his command, as Gen. Pat Cleburne did at the Battle of Franklin, as well as seven other brigadier and major generals, that is an act over and above the line of duty. That is what this bill means. If this bill is enacted into law, what was said when the dollar-a-day pension bill was up I repeat now. I shall never ask for a medal of honor or a pension under this bill. Hence I am not personally interested. Of course every soldier to be eligible must have received an honorable discharge from the service. To all such roll-of-honor men Senator SHIVELY, of the Senate Pensions Committee, and myself propose that the Government of the United States shall pay a special pension of $10 a month for life in addition to any other pension a beneficiary may be receiving.

I know that my eloquent and ornate friend from Texas [Mr. DIES] will not object to this bill, because it demands service and gallantry at the front—on the firing line.

Col. Orville T. Chamberlain, of South Bend, Ind., member of the committee on legislation of the Army and Navy Medal of Honor Legion of the United States, who appeared in person before the committee to urge the enactment of this bill, furnished the committee with much valuable information. I am sad to say that the United States is the only civilized country of the world that does not pay special pensions to those who have rendered such conspicuous acts of bravery as to be deemed entitled to medals of honor. Compared with other countries and empires, the United States has awarded a surprisingly small number of medals of honor.

All told, only 3,088 medals of honor have been awarded by the United States to her Army and Navy heroes in all our wars from 1776 to 1914. Of this number 906 were issued for Civil War service under a mistake of law and facts—issued to men for participation in the Battle of Gettysburg, although they took no part whatever in that famous battle. A regiment—I think it was the Twenty-seventh Maine—that did duty at Arlington when the Battle of Gettysburg was in progress and was not within 70 miles of the firing line, were all of them, men and officers, awarded medals of honor under that law. They could not get medals of honor under my bill.

Eliminating these, only 1,526 Civil War medals remain, and of the recipients of these fewer than 300 are alive to-day. All other medals for all wars since the Civil War number 656, and that includes the heroes of the Spanish-American War.

Living and dead, rightfully or wrongfully, only 3,088 persons have received Uncle Sam's medal of honor. The Confederate States placed the names of 699 of her soldiers on her roll of honor for distinguished bravery at the Battle of Chickamauga alone. The North, for bravery of her soldiers in the same battle, awarded medals of honor to only nine.

In the Franco-Prussian War, which lasted only seven months, 40,000 medals of honor were issued, wearers of the Iron Cross of Germany, in that one war alone, and all received pensions besides. In France the Legion of Honor, whose members received special pensions, numbered 43,851 in 1892. In England those who receive the Victoria cross are paid a special pension of $50 a year. China is the only country in which the profession of arms is not honored, although special acts of bravery there are rewarded by permission to wear the "yellow jacket." In the United States yellow is not considered a game color. [Laughter.] And those who have a yellow streak down their backs are not supposed to be game men.

The record shows that nearly every nation except the United States gives to decorated heroes a special pension to accompany the medal of honor. While the United States gives no special pension to those heroes as such, it frequently passes special pension acts, recently referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], for the benefit of those whose conduct was not sufficient to earn such medals, thus discriminating against the medal-of-honor men.

Andrew Carnegie, of whom some of you may have heard, gave $5,000,000 to establish a fund to reward heroes in civil life. For one act of heroism $6,500 was given; and pensions were awarded in some cases as high as $75 a month.

Under this philanthropy, as I believe they call it, up to January, 1914, the sum of $1,045,503 had been awarded, and pensions were in force aggregating $58,350 per annum—for only civil-life heroism. Under the bill I have introduced it will cost the first year only $12,240 all told. I vouch for these figures, and I am not going to scare anybody. The cost will rapidly decrease, of course. In a few years the Civil War medal wearers will all be dead—in less than eight years, all told.

The main value of this recognition of valor will not be in paying an old debt to the soldier who deserves the reward, but in furnishing an object lesson and an incentive to the youth of America which will return many fold in patriotic inspiration in all future wars. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LINTHICUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13044) to pension the widow and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9671. An act to appropriate $5,000 to erect a suitable monument on the battle grounds at the Horse Shoe, on the Tallapoosa River, in the State of Alabama; and

H. R. 9897. An act to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under the order previously made, until to-morrow, Thursday, March 26, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 26, 1914.

Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our heavenly Father, we know that Thou hast neither dawn nor eventide, seeing that Thine all beholding eye sleepeth not nor slumbereth. Yet unto us Thou dost bestow the great boon of the alternate mercies of night and of day. And now that Thou hast raised us from the darkness and death of the night to the life and light of a new day we consecrate to Thee Thine own priceless gift. Work in us, we humbly beseech Thee, this day to will and to do Thine own good pleasure, that in all things this day we may glorify Thee, who art our God and our Savior. And unto Thee will we render all praise now and forevermore. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Harris, of the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce. Lancaster County, Pa., ranked second as regards value of the production of crops; McLean County, Ill., was third; Whitman County, Wash., fourth; Livingston County, Ill., fifth; Iroquois County, Ill., sixth; La Salle County, Ill., seventh; and Aroostook County, Me., eighth.

The valuation (at the farm) of the crops raised in Los Angeles County, Cal., according to the census, was $14,720,900; Lancaster County, Pa., $13,059,600; McLean County, Ill., $12,811,500; Whitman County, Wash., $12,540,700; Livingston County, Ill., $11,377,300; Iroquois County, Ill., $10,607,800; La Salle County, $10,222,200; and Aroostook County, Me., $10,151,000. The total valuation of the crops raised in these eight counties was $95,491,000, or about 2 per cent of the total valuation of all crops raised in the United States, which was $5,487,161,000.

The principal crops raised in Los Angeles County, in the order of their value, were fruits, etc., hay and forage, live stock, dairy products, etc., and vegetables; of Lancaster County, Pa., corn, wheat, and oats, and live stock and dairy products; of McLean County, Ill.; Whitman County, Wash.; Livingston County, Ill.; and La Salle County, Ill., corn, wheat, oats, and cereals; and of Aroostook County, Me., potatoes and vegetables. The principal crops of the United States, in the order of their value, were the cereals, corn, wheat, oats, etc., hay and forage, and cotton.

Some interesting data are presented by the figures for the value per acre and per capita of the crops raised in these eight banner counties of the United States. The figures for Los Angeles County show that the total value of the crops raised there averaged $35 per acre and $29 per capita (the city of Los Angeles, with a population of 320,000, being within Los Angeles County, is the chief reason for the low rate per capita); for Lancaster County, Pa., $28 per acre and $78 per capita; for McLean County, Ill., $18 per acre and $188 per capita; Whitman County, Wash., $14 per acre and $377 per capita; Livingston County, Ill., $18 per acre and $281 per capita; Iroquois County, Ill., $16 per acre and $298 per capita; La Salle County, Ill., $17 per acre and $113 per capita; and Aroostook County, Me., $23 per acre and $136 per capita. The corresponding crop value figures (at the farm) for the United States for the same year were $16 per acre and $60 per capita.

Mr. WORKS. One correction should be made in the statement. The population of Los Angeles is given at 320,000, as shown by the last census, while, in fact, the city of Los Angeles now has a population of over half a million and is the largest city in population on the Pacific coast.

DOMMICK TAHENY AND JOHN W. MORTIMER.

Mr. BRISTOW, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1058) for the relief of Dommick Taheny and John W. Mortimer, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 381) thereon.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency in preparing a bill relating to rural credits is hereby authorized to employ the assistance of a financial expert to advise on technical points involved, at a salary not to exceed $25 per day while so employed, the total amount to be paid for such purpose not to exceed $500, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a resolution on the subject of Panama Canal tolls. It is in the usual form, and I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 316), as follows:

Be it resolved by the United States Senate, That in pursuance of the true American doctrine of equal and exact justice to all, special privilege to none, that it is expedient and just that all vessels or tonnage passing through the Panama Canal shall bear and pay a sum of compensation so adjusted as shall compensate for expense and upkeep of the canal.

That the amount and method of payment of such tolls shall be regulated jointly by the Secretaries of War and the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I object.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be pardoned? The immediate consideration of the resolution is not desired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

TRADE WITH SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. WEEKS. I submit a resolution, which I ask to have read and given immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 317), as follows:

Whereas it is desirable to develop and extend commercial relations between the United States and the countries of South America by the establishment of direct lines of communication for carrying the United States mail and for the transportation of passengers and freight; and

Whereas private capital has not engaged in this service to a sufficient extent to furnish facilities comparable to those enjoyed by the people of other countries having trade relations with South America: Therefore it is

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be prepared, in detail, a plan for the establishment of a line of ships to run between the cities of New York and New Orleans and the city of Valparaiso, Chile, and intermediate ports, to consist of the cruisers Columbia and Minneapolis and the scout cruisers Salem, Chester, and Birmingham, and that the information requested in this resolution shall include the following:

1. The time required by these ships to make a round trip between the ports named.
2. The number of pasengers which could be carried in each ship as now equipped or with any changes that would not impair their usefulness if required in the naval service.
3. The amount of freight that each ship could carry under similar conditions; this estimate to include mail as well as freight.
4. The number of naval officers and seamen required to man the ships engaged in the service which is proposed.
5. The probable cost of the service, including the pay of the officers and men employed in connection with it, and all other necessary elements, such as wharfage in the cities where the ships would touch, fuel, repairs, and maintenance of every description.
6. The cost of such necessary changes as may be required to put the ships named in condition for such service, in removing unnecessary military equipment, and any other changes necessary in order to carry passengers and freight safely and to adequately perform the service proposed in this resolution.
7. An expression of opinion by the department as to whether the above-named ships can be used for such purposes without impairing their usefulness for naval purposes should their prompt return to the naval service be required.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will consent to have the resolution go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WEEKS. Before that is done I should like to make a few comments on the resolution. Perhaps the Senator from Virginia after I have done so will be willing to have the resolution adopted without going to the committee.

Mr. President, at the present time South American mails are sent at long and sometimes irregular intervals, and all American mails south of the Equator are carried in vessels sailing under a foreign flag. It is the purpose of this resolution to call for the information which it is believed will justify using fast cruisers of the Navy as a mail line to Valparaiso via the Panama Canal. These ships are of two types, the second-class cruisers Columbia and Minneapolis, carrying light batteries, having a trial speed of about 23 knots, and the scout cruisers Birmingham, Chester, and Salem, without substantial batteries, having a trial speed ranging from 24½ to 26½ knots an hour. These vessels, especially the three scout cruisers, are not built for fighting purposes, but are in the time of war the eyes of the fleet, furnishing information, which their great speed will enable them to do. In time of peace they are not useful ships, because they have not the guns which would make them available for training purposes.

At this time our mail service to Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay is carried by the Lamport & Holt Line, which makes regular sailings from New York, or by other steamers which are temporarily available for that purpose—most of the mail being carried by the Lamport & Holt Line—the other ships used in this service being those of the Prince, Norton, Houston, Barber, and American-Rio Plata Lines. Many of these companies are subsidiary to the English Royal Mail Line, and it is believed that the Lamport & Holt Line is controlled by that company. Our mails to the west coast, after reaching the Isthmus, are forwarded to their destination by a weekly service under the terms arranged by the Universal Postal Convention. At present some mails for Argentina and Uruguay are sent by this route, but the service is very slow, and this, it may be easily assumed, militates against the development of our trade with South America.

It takes at the present time 7 days to carry the mail to the Isthmus and from 22 to 24 days to deliver it at Valparaiso, the shortest time being at least 22 days, and a proportional time to Guayaquil, Ecuador, which is 900 miles south of Panama, and Callao, Peru, which is 1,400 miles south of Panama, is required. By using the vessels of the Navy which I have mentioned and running them at a 15-knot speed, which is an economical rate for them to make, they would carry substantially coal enough so that by replenishing their supply at Valparaiso and recoaling at Panama they could make the trip from New York, stopping at the Isthmus and Callao, in about 13 days, or mail could be delivered in Valparaiso, Buenos Aires, and Montevideo from 7 to 9 days quicker than can be done either by the east or west coast routes.

It is believed these vessels could without any considerable expense be arranged to carry a considerable number of first-class passengers, and the amount of freight which they could carry would probably be sufficient to pay the expenses of the line from the beginning. I am opposed to Government ownership of transportation lines; and, generally speaking, in my judgment the Government is the least economical and in many cases the least effective business agency. If later on private capital undertakes the building and running of a line of steamers over this route, I should be inclined to withdraw the Government line, on the theory that it is unwise to put the Government in competition with private capital in such service; but that is a matter which may be properly considered when the service is once established and we are assured of our legitimate share in South American trade.

We are in the position of having spent $400,000,000 in the building of a canal, one of the reasons for doing so being that it would aid in the extension of our foreign trade; but as far as I know there are no American steamers prepared to undertake this service. From Panama south there is a Chilean, a Peruvian, and an English line, the latter controlled by the Royal Mail. English and German shipping interests are alive to the possibilities to be derived from the opening of the canal. They know that if they once secure lines of trade that it is difficult for others to successfully get into the same field. I am informed that the English Government has very recently increased the subsidy to the Royal Mail Line $360,000 a year for the express purpose of extending and developing this particular service; and as we are not prepared to cover the field in any other way and this Government owns ships which are not useful for any other purpose in time of peace, why not use them in developing such a trade? It seems to me that we might fairly be criticized if we fail to authorize this line and have it ready for operation the day the canal opens.

At the present time the foreign trade of Ecuador, Peru, and Chile amounts to $340,000,000. The eastern ports of the United States, by way of the canal, will be several days nearer this trade than are our commercial rivals. We at the present time control about 30 per cent of the trade of Ecuador, less than 25 per cent of the trade of Peru, and less than 15 per cent of the trade of Chile. Great Britain and Germany control the larger part of the balance. The trade of either of these nations with Chile amounts to more in dollars and cents than our total trade with the Pacific coast nations of South America. If this fast mail line were established, it would undoubtedly very greatly develop our business in the important ports of Montevideo and Buenos Aires, which are less than two days by railroad from Valparaiso. Argentina and Uruguay have a foreign trade amounting to much more than a billion annually, that of Argentina alone being more than $900,000,000. We obtain an insignificant part of this trade, compared with what we might have if we had better, more frequent, and quicker connections. I should add that the steamers running from New Orleans will make the run to Valparaiso about two days quicker than from New York, which might be important in the delivery of freight, if not so important in the mail service, and it may be desirable to run steamers alternately from New York and New Orleans if this line is established.

All this possibility is an attractive picture, and it will be a long step in the development of our trade in South America if we take prompt action to firmly establish this line of steamers. It would be an inspiring thought for the American people that a ship flying the American flag, carrying American mail, passengers, and freight, will be ready and waiting at the Atlantic gates of the canal to continue her trip to the western ports of South America—the first merchant ship to pass through the canal.

I hope the Senator from Virginia will not object to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, first I desire to suggest an amendment to the resolution. I should like to include the cities of New York, Norfolk, and New Orleans. I should want to have Norfolk included in any estimate made.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have not intended in the resolution to refer specifically to cities of this country. I should say, generally speaking, that it might be wise to have these ships, if the line is established, run alternately from New York and from New Orleans. I want to state to the Senator from Virginia that it was not my purpose or my thought that this line should start from Boston. I am looking at it from the larger national standpoint rather than the local standpoint.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to say, in that connection, that so far as Norfolk is concerned it is not from any local standpoint that I view it. Great lines of railroad concentrate there from the West and South. There is as large a territory covered by importations meeting at Norfolk as at almost any city that you could name; but this shows the necessity and the wisdom of having this resolution referred to the committee to determine to what extent and where the investigation should be directed. This is confined to specific vessels; it might be found better to get information including others, and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will consent that the resolution go to the Naval Committee, so that it may be properly prepared so as to suit all sections of the country.

I wish to say that I am not opposed to obtaining the information desired. I favor it. I should like to have it obtained and to have the report of the department upon it, and I wish to have the resolution broad enough to cover the various phases that many Senators would like to have included in the information furnished.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that in the efforts heretofore made to secure legislation in reference to the rehabilitation of the merchant marine the bills always provided that the ships should at least touch at certain South Atlantic and Gulf ports. This resolution could doubtless be so framed that there would be no discrimination, as there ought not to be. If a ship should start from New York, there is no reason why it should not touch at Norfolk, I apprehend.

Mr. SWANSON. That was my object in desiring to have the resolution referred, because I thought that it would save time to have the investigation and report made so as to include the different ports.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object to the reference of the resolution, of course, but I will venture to express the hope that the Committee on Naval Affairs will take it up promptly, because it is important that when we open this great waterway the American flag should be seen on some merchant ships engaged in the foreign trade, and particularly in the trade with South and Central America.

Mr. SWANSON. I should be very glad to have this information, and I am satisfied that the Naval Committee would not object to obtaining it; but the resolution ought to be so drawn as to include all sections of the country and all phases of this matter. I hope the Senator will consent to have the resolution referred.

Mr. WEEKS. The resolution as presented is as broad as the country. There is no attempt being made to limit its operation to any particular section of the country. It is simply a resolution asking for information. I have no desire to prevent the resolution being considered by the Naval Affairs Committee, if it seems best that that should be done, but if we are going to take the action which I wish—that is, to have this line ready for operation on the day the Panama Canal is open for business—then there should be no considerable delay. The distinguished chairman of the Naval Committee is present, and I will say that I hope, if it be decided to refer the resolution to his committee, that we may have as much expedition as possible in reporting it out, so that the department may take up the investigation which will be made.

It will be necessary, in order to properly undertake this work, that the resolution be referred to the Department of Commerce and also to the Post Office Department to ascertain the extent of the mail and the trade which may develop and may be available at once to assist in making the line profitable. It will take time to do it. I am desirous that there shall be no unreasonable delay.

I am not at all solicitous about the port from which these ships shall sail or the ports where they shall touch. I had much rather leave that to those who are going to operate the line.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask the Senator whether the resolution calls for information as to the possibility or the feasibility of having this line touch at a point on the Pacific coast.

Mr. WEEKS. The Pacific coast of South America.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. That is exactly what is intended; that it is to run from the east coast of the United States to Panama, to go through the Panama Canal, and down the west coast of South America, touching, presumably, at Guayaquil, in Ecuador, and at Callao, in Peru, and certainly having for its terminus Valparaiso, in Chile.

Mr. JONES. What I meant was the Pacific coast of the United States.

Mr. WEEKS. It would not in any way affect the Pacific coast of the United States.

Mr. JONES. Could we not have information as to a line from some point on the Pacific coast of the United States to the eastern coast of South America, going through the Panama Canal?

Mr. WEEKS. I have no objection to that information being obtained, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. But it would not be obtained under this resolution?

Mr. WEEKS. It would not be.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I am satisfied that the Naval Committee will consider the resolution very promptly. We desire this information. I do; I desire the investigation and information to be broad, but if we are going to do anything of this kind, it ought to include more than simply what is contained in the resolution. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Massachusetts will consent to the reference of the resolution, and I am satisfied the Naval Committee will promptly report upon it.

Mr. WEEKS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that we are limited in what we do to the ships which we have available for this purpose. We could not put on steamship lines from every port in the United States to every port in South America or the Orient or Australasia. We must limit ourselves to probably the most profitable route and the route which will enable us to take advantage of the building of the Panama Canal.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, that is true, but it seems to me that all the different routes proposed should be investigated and the various seaport cities ought to have an opportunity to present their claims to Congress, so that full information may be obtained. That is all I ask.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I ask for the reading of that part of the resolution which indicates where these ships are to sail from?

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the entire resolution may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution submitted by Mr. WEEKS.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I would suggest that the Senator modify his resolution, so far as naming the cities of New York and New Orleans is concerned, and say "cities or ports on the eastern or western coast of the United States and South American ports." That will leave the door open to everybody to make a showing, and then the resolution will not have to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have an idea that, if the resolution is referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, we could ascertain what ports it would be advisable to have these boats sail from, and the committee could prepare a resolution that would be more specific than the one now before the Senate, and one which would cover every port that might be suggested. There are hundreds of little ports along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts all of which, of course, could not very well be considered in this connection, but if the resolution were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, those interested could prepare a resolution that would be broad enough to cover all phases of the question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, certainly the Senator from Virginia would not make the resolution any broader than to include the eastern and western coasts of the United States and the western coast of South America. If the Committee on Naval Affairs should undertake to investigate these commercial matters, they would be at it a year. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is to utilize the commercial vessels which the Navy owns and make them of some practical use to the people of the United States; and it seems to me when Senators begin to haggle about whether the ships shall run from New York or Baltimore or Washington or Norfolk or Newport News or some other port we are belittling the whole proposition. I do not expect any of these ships to run from any of the ports in Kansas [laughter], but I am very much in favor of this resolution. I do not care whether the ships sail from New York or Norfolk.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it will be practically impossible for the Navy Department to conduct an investigation covering every port in the United States. That would involve delay; it would be impossible to get the information in time to be of practical use; but the investigation ought to cover such ports as are available for this purpose. The object of having the resolution referred to the committee is to secure the information regarding the different ports of the country, so as to cover everything, and not to have it restricted. It is usual for resolutions of this character to be referred to the committee. I wish to say, speaking for myself, that I am in favor of a prompt report on the resolution and in favor of obtaining the information, and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will consent that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will accept my assurance, I will promise him that the Committee on Naval Affairs will consider the resolution promptly and report it promptly. As naval vessels are involved, I think the Secretary of the Navy and the Committee on Naval Affairs ought to be consulted in reference to the matter, and that the resolution should be referred to that committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course, Mr. President, the resolution would go eventually to the Secretary of the Navy; but, with the assurance given by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I am willing to have the resolution referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives on House bill 13612, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 13612) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 29 and 39, further insisting upon its disagreement to the residue of the amendments of the Senate, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments still in disagreement, agree to the further conference asked for by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

H. R. 14330. An act to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise, made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor, was read twice by its title.

Mr. REED. I wish to request that House bill 14330, relating to convict labor, be allowed to lie upon the table temporarily without disposition, because a similar bill was introduced in the Senate by my colleague [Mr. STONE], referred to a committee, and it has been reported favorably. Just what action my colleague will desire to take with reference to the House bill or the Senate bill, or the substitution of one for the other, I am not yet advised.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will lie on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS SWINOMISH SLOUGH, WASH.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (S. 4250) to authorize the county commissioners of Skagit County, Wash., to construct a bridge across the Swinomish Slough, opposite the town of La Conner, returned to the Senate in compliance with its request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion was entered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. JONES. We have passed a similar House bill, and I simply want to indefinitely postpone the Senate bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed, the Senate having passed a similar House bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a motion in the nature of a resolution coming over from a preceding day. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow that motion to go over without prejudice to-day, so that we may consider the calendar for a short time?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly. I have no desire to interfere with the consideration of bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the motion will go over without prejudice.

RAILWAYS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on next Thursday, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate upon the financial condition of the railways of the United States and the results of governmental regulation.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

The bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress was announced as first in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1760) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 655) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to survey the lands of the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation and open the same to settlement was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2242) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3112) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

MINERAL LANDS IN INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 2651) providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and other minerals within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry was announced as next in order.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I had hoped that this bill might be taken up and disposed of to-day, but the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has offered an amendment to it, and I see he is not in his seat. On that account I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TELEGRAMS OF SENATORS.

The resolution (S. Res. 156) limiting expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the resolution go over.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me we ought to dispose of this resolution without any argument at this time as it has been heretofore argued very fully. There has been an amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah which I think will be satisfactory, and consequently it seems to me we ought to dispose of the resolution now. The resolution limits the amount of telegrams which Senators may send to $60 per year each.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move to take up the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can not do that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me, inasmuch as it has been twice considered by the Senate——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to move to take up the resolution at this time is not in order.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The resolution (S. Res. 84) providing that any Senator upon his own request may be recorded and counted as present in order to constitute a quorum was announced as next in order; and there being no objection, the Senate proceeded to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee was agreed to on a previous day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee already agreed to, at the end of line 4, is to insert the word "state" before the word "how," so as to read "and state how he would vote if not paired."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I have in my own mind an answer to the question I am going to ask, but I wish to draw out the opinions of other Senators.

Suppose, upon a roll call, it should appear that there was a quorum present, and that a majority of those voting had voted for a measure, but that majority was not a majority of a quorum, what would be the effect of such a vote? That is altogether possible under the proposed rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not see that. That would depend upon a constitutional question. I do not think that has anything to do with this resolution.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I am asking for an interpretation of that.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is a very serious proposition that the Senator put—what would happen if a quorum was present and shown upon the roll call, and yet no quorum voted for a measure. That is a question to which due consideration must be given. This rule, however, provides against a condition which we have had heretofore in the Senate quite frequently, where we have really had a quorum present, but, the vote developing the fact that apparently there was not a quorum present, we had to stop the transaction of business and wait to get a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution may go over.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is true; but the Senator will realize that under this proposed rule it is altogether possible, and will occur without doubt, that there will be a roll call, and a majority of the votes cast will not be a majority of a quorum. On a roll call, a majority having voted for the bill, it would carry, but a majority of the quorum would not have voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. But if the Senator will consider the fact——

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how there could help being a majority of a quorum if a quorum votes. In such cases the majority carries.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I do not think the Senator understands the resolution. The resolution provides that a Senator may abstain from voting because he is paired.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes; I see. The Constitution does not provide that it must be a majority of a quorum, however.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will notice the fact that he is permitted to state how he would have voted if he were not paired.

Mr. BRISTOW. But this is a proposed rule by which less than a majority of a quorum can pass a bill. That is the meaning of the proposed rule; and I will never favor a rule like that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think it is the meaning of the proposed rule. It is not intended, I am sure. The idea was to count a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution may go over.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is utterly impossible to cover the point suggested by the Senator from Kansas by a rule. A rule of the Senate can not control the Constitution of the United States; at least, I assume not. The proposed rule simply provides for the ascertainment of a quorum. What number of Senators must vote under those circumstances in order to pass a bill is a question which, I assume, the Presiding Officer, in the first instance, and after him the courts of the country, must determine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. CUMMINS. This rule is proposed simply to avoid the very frequent condition in which there is a quorum present in the Chamber, and yet it can not be counted as being present.

Mr. LODGE. The point the Senator from Kansas has raised seems to me to be a very serious one, and I do not think we ought to——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection.

Mr. LODGE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say that while that is a serious matter, it is one that we can not remedy. We frequently pass bills here when there is not a quorum present. Bills are often passed when a majority of the Members of the Senate present do not vote for them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

Mr. OVERMAN. We can not regulate that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for. The Secretary will state the next business on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 218) proposing an amendment to the standing rules of the Senate was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course I recognize the right of the Senator from Utah to ask that the resolution go over; but I should like to know what objection he has to the rule, because at some time or other we must have it disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason I asked to have it go over was that the chairman of the Committee on Printing is absent from the Chamber, and he requested that it be not considered in his absence. I wish to state to the Senator that I think the rule would conflict with the present law. I am also opposed to it on other grounds. It would take more than five minutes to discuss the resolution, because I wish to make a statement in relation to it myself, and I know other members of the committee wish to discuss it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desired to ascertain just how the Senator felt about it. His position would make it impossible ever to consider the proposed rule while we are upon the calendar. I shall move to take up the resolution at the very first opportunity, waiting, of course, until the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is present, as he is the chairman of the Committee on Printing, so that we can have it disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to consider it at the very first opportunity when the Senator from Florida is present. I wish the Senator to know that I have no desire whatever to prevent action by the Senate upon the resolution.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 26) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3863) granting lands to Hot Springs Lodge, No. 62, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, of Hot Springs, Ark., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3023) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 94) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to investigate the condition of trade in China, for the purpose of determining the desirability of establishing there a permanent exposition of the products of the United States of America, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2425) to authorize the Roanoke River Development Co. to construct and maintain a dam across the Roanoke River in Mecklenburg County, in the State of Virginia, approximately 20 miles below the town of Clarksville, in said State, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

CHARLES C. CROWELL.

The bill (S. 2590) to reimburse Charles C. Crowell for two months' extra pay in lieu of traveling expenses was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $36 to reimburse Charles C. Crowell, late sergeant, Company B, Thirty-fifth Regiment United States Infantry, for two months' extra pay in lieu of traveling expenses.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 3971) to provide for a permanent exhibit of the resources of the States of the Union in or near Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JACOB WIRTH.

The bill (S. 2069) for the reimbursement of Jacob Wirth for two horses lost while hired by the United States Geological Survey was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jacob Wirth, of Poplar, Mont., the sum of $180, in compensation for two horses lost while hired by the United States Geological Survey.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 4260) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of other wars than the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the bill may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4261) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

CLAIMS OF INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The bill (S. 1759) to reimburse certain fire insurance companies the amounts paid by them for property destroyed by fire in suppressing the bubonic plague in the Territory of Hawaii in the years 1899 and 1900 was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the Senator will not make that request. This is a bill to pay certain insurance companies for claims brought about by reason of the destruction by the Government of a large number of buildings in Honolulu because of the bubonic plague.

The insurance companies involved are some American companies and several foreign companies. For six or seven years the representatives of the foreign countries concerned have asked the State Department to use its good offices to have these companies reimbursed. If the Senator will read the report, he will see that the State Department feels that Congress has been dilatory in the matter.

If the Senate does not want to pass the bill, this is as good a time as any to say so. I am unwilling, however, to have it go over without that statement being made; and before it goes over I want the Senate to understand the situation.

The fire occurred in 1902, I think. If Senators will examine the report that has been filed, they will find that the matter has been brought to the attention of the committee on many occasions, the earliest being in 1906, during the time the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] was Secretary of State. The matter has been brought to the attention of Congress again and again. In the report are copied statements by the representatives of the foreign Governments. They are unable to understand why it is that those who lost their property by reason of destruction at the instance of the Government were paid, and why it is that certain insurance companies have been paid, and how it comes about that these companies which insured the property and had policies upon destroyed property can not have their claims considered by Congress.

More than a million dollars has been paid on account of this fire, and everybody concerned is in exactly the same situation. These claims have been referred to a commission and the amounts determined. There is not a single solitary question open for discussion. It is a pure, plain proposition of whether the Government wants to pay a liability that is conceded by everybody who has ever examined the question.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that there is no excuse in the world for not having paid these claims long ago, unless it is that they are due to corporations. The property was burned by the Government to stop the ravages of disease; a portion of the amount involved has been paid, and it all ought to be paid now. Every day we leave it in that way is a disgrace to this country.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the State Department has done its best. It has implored Congress time and again to take up this matter; and having reported the bill from the Committee on Claims, I thought it was my duty to let the Senate know the situation. It can act as it pleases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I made the objection, and I wish to explain my reasons for it. I did not object to this particular bill; I do not know much about it, but I object to this way of carrying on business.

Here are a couple of resolutions for changing the rules of the Senate. They were both objected to. Under the rule that we are pursuing now, when you reach a bill of any importance, of course there is going to be objection. The only bills that can be passed when we are doing business in this way are the bills of no importance, until 2 o'clock. I was detained from the Senate by official business, and when I came in I found that several resolutions that ought to have been considered upon the calendar had gone over.

Mr. BRYAN. I submit, Mr. President, that that is no reason why a matter of this importance should go over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I made the objection in order to get the opportunity to say that I think the bills upon the calendar ought to be considered in the order in which they come, and ought to be disposed of. If you do not pursue that course, of course a bill which is of such a character that nobody knows anything about it is not objected to; but if you take a bill like Senate bill 6282, which is on the calendar, for the regulation of the sale of cocaine and morphine in this country, its consideration probably will be objected to upon the ground that somebody wants some amendment made to it.

I now withdraw the objection. I made it to get an opportunity to make this statement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Florida that he objected to a measure which I think ought to be considered and which was considered twice in this body. I want to have some fair opportunity to present the bills I have on the calendar. I do not want persons to get up and object every time I want anything, and then, whenever they want something, ask that no objection be made to it.

If we are going to have this calendar, we ought to take it up and let each man have his say upon the calendar and not object to it. If we are not going to do that, what result will it have? It will compel a person to object to everything in order to force consideration of his bill, which would be wrong. It seems to me we ought to take up the calendar and consider it, and have it understood that the man whose bill is reached has a right to have it considered then.

I shall not object to the Senator's request notwithstanding that; but I can not have objections made to my bills continuously, especially where they have been considered by the Senate before, and then be expected to give consent to everything else that comes along.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, we are proceeding under the rules of the Senate, and a single objection does lie before 1 o'clock.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not want to raise the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. MYERS. I do not object, but I wish to join in what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has said. Several of my bills have been objected to this morning, and I do not know why anybody should object to them. It seems to me they ought to be voted on. I do not object to other people's bills, but mine are nearly always objected to.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that about the only bills that have been passed this morning so far have been the bills in which the Senator has been interested.

Mr. BORAH. Regular order!

Mr. MYERS. Why, Mr. President, I acknowledge with great gratitude that the Senate has passed one of my bills, but several others have been objected to.

Mr. BORAH. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The regular order being called for, and there being no objection, the Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1759) to reimburse certain fire insurance companies the amounts paid by them for property destroyed by fire in suppressing the bubonic plague in the Territory of Hawaii in the years 1899 and 1900, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "$82,225" and insert "$82,975," and on page 2, line 3, after the numerals "$4,150," to insert "Caledonia Insurance Company, of Edinburgh, Scotland, $750," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $82,975 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the Trans-Atlantic Fire Insurance Co., $9,500; Prussian National Fire Insurance Co., $2,850; North German Fire Insurance Co., $8,000; Hamburg-Bremen Fire Insurance Co., $10,450; Royal Insurance Co., $25,100; Liverpool & London & Globe Insurance Co., $6,900; New Zealand Fire Insurance Co., $6,025; Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., $9,250; National Fire Insurance Co., of Hartford, Conn., $4,150; Caledonia Insurance Co., of Edinburgh, Scotland, $750; the aforesaid sums being the amounts paid by each of the said companies on account of insurance against fire on property in the Territory of Hawaii, which property was destroyed by the Government in the suppression of the bubonic plague in said Territory in the years 1899 and 1900.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION, ETC.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the time for the convening of Congress and commencement of the terms of the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let that go over.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that we ought to have a hearing upon this measure. It has been on the calendar for several months.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state for the benefit of the Senator from Colorado that it is now 1 o'clock, and, under the rule, he can move to take up the joint resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the joint resolution be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to make one suggestion to the Senator from Colorado before the motion is put. This joint resolution will involve a good deal of debate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It will take just as much a week from now or a month from now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is true, but we are now attempting to dispose of bills on the calendar by taking up unobjected cases.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am perfectly willing after the debate is started, if we can continue it to a certain time, that then any length of time the Senator wants may be given to this measure. It was introduced in the Senate a year ago, and it seems to me that it ought to have consideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If we take up this measure now it will cut off the consideration of all the remainder of the calendar.

Mr. LODGE. It will cut off all unobjected business. Such a procedure loads the calendar and never lets us clear the calendar of unobjected business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will excuse me, Rule VIII says that the Senate shall take up the calendar under certain circumstances and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock—and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but upon motion the Senate may continue such consideration; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for "concurrent and other resolutions."

It is that very point to which I intended to address attention. Had I not been detained outside of the Senate upon absolutely necessary official business when we reached calendar Nos. 101 and 109, I should have moved their consideration, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me one moment? Before the Senator continues his discussion, will he read the 1 o'clock rule on the preceding page?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question of doubt but that after 1 o'clock it is in the power of a Senator to move to take up a bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is now after 1 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not subject to debate.

Mr. LODGE. There is no question about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question must be put without debate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WALSH. The rule reads—and if such consent be given the motion shall not be subject to amendment, and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up.

We may debate, however, the question as to whether it is appropriate to take up the measure at this time. That does not involve the merits of the controversy at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled, and from the ruling of the Chair the Senator from Montana may appeal, of course.

Mr. WALSH. I think the meaning of the rule is perfectly plain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there an appeal?

Mr. WALSH. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it. The ruling of the Chair is sustained. The question is, Shall the joint resolution be taken up? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is absent from the city, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent, and transfer it to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence, I feel that I ought to withdraw my vote.

Mr. HUGHES. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 34, as follows:

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be made the special order for April 20 at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have given notice and have had it on the calendar for the last month.

Mr. GALLINGER and others. Regular order!

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to know what is the use of having a calendar, if we can not reach measures upon it and have them considered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There are many measures on the calendar which would have been reached if we had proceeded and if the Senator from Colorado had been content to go on with it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. LODGE, and others. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next bill on the calendar will be announced.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 4352) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. There are a great many House and Senate pension bills on the calendar and they ought to be disposed of one way or the other. I therefore move, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Georgia, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4352.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], I withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is absent from the city, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I again transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I will let this statement stand for the day.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I again make a transfer of my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when Mr. STONE's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. STONE] is still unable to attend the sessions of the Senate. He is paired, as has been announced, with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and make the same transfer. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I announce the same pair and the same transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when has name was called). Repeating the announcement made on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS] with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HUGHES (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently, forgetting at the moment that I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce for the day the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] and his pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. WARREN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. I vote "yea."

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4352) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors. It proposes to pension the following-named persons at the rates stated:

William Heywood, late of Company I, Fifteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and Company G, Nineteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Levi Hoskins, late of Company I, Twenty-fourth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SMOOT. I move to amend the bill on page 2 by striking out the clause from line 23 to line 26, inclusive, the soldier referred to therein having died.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the bill by striking out, on page 2, after line 22, the following:

The name of George F. Brechtel, late of Company A, Eighth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to strike out the clause, from line 3 to line 6, inclusive, on page 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Louise Amy, widow of Simon Amy, late of Companies I and C, Eighty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the report filed by the committee shows that this claimant was married to the soldier, now deceased, on September 9, 1892. Under the law of the land we have no right to include this claim in this bill. No widow married subsequent to June 27, 1890, is eligible to a pension. By this special bill, therefore, we are undertaking to repeal in this one case the general law upon the subject. That is the reason I move to strike out the clause.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the facts in this particular case are that—

Louise Amy is the widow of Simon Amy, who served as a private in Companies I and C, Eighty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry——

Mr. LODGE. From what report is the Senator from Utah reading?

Mr. SMOOT. This is from the report of the committee in this case. The item referred to is on page 5 of the bill, from line 3 to line 6, inclusive. The report continues:

Soldier enlisted February 27, 1864, and was honorably discharged June 7, 1865, by reason of the close of the war. He was wounded in right leg at Laurel Hill, Va., May 8, 1864, and was granted pension under the general law at $4 per month from discharge, which was increased to $6 August 16, 1876; to $8 July 1, 1885; and to $10 January 6, 1909.

Mr. LODGE. From what is the Senator from Utah now reading?

Mr. SMOOT. I am reading from the report on this particular case.

Mr. LODGE. From what page of the report?

Mr. SMOOT. From page 10 of report on Senate bill No. 1092.

Mr. LODGE. That is the Amy case?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Amy case. The report continues:

On May 22, 1912, he accepted an allowance of $14 per month under the age-and-service act of May 11, 1912, certificate No. 132042. He died of Bright's disease of kidneys November 27, 1912.

Claimant was married to the soldier September 9, 1892. She has never applied for a pension under the general law for the reason that she can not prove soldier's death to have been from cause of service origin, and she has no pensionable status under the act of April 19, 1908, on account of her having married the soldier subsequent to June 27, 1890—

This the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] has stated. The report continues:

Claimant is now 61 years of age and, as the evidence shows, in poor health and destitute circumstances. She is a victim of tuberculosis and is physically incapable of earning a living and is left without property or means of support of any kind. There are many precedents for legislation in cases of this character, and your committee report the bill favorably for pension at $12 per month.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask a question. Is it true that the Committee on Pensions entirely disregard the law relative to widows' pensions?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this bill would not be before the Senate if it were not for the fact that it was introduced as a special act in behalf of this widow. It is true that a widow married to a soldier subsequent to June 27, 1890, under the law is not entitled to a pension; but there have been many cases in the other House and in the Senate where, in the case of widows in destitute circumstances, pensions have been allowed. This is one of those cases.

Mr. LODGE. Such legislation has been enacted frequently?

Mr. SMOOT. It has been done frequently.

Mr. BRYAN. Has the Senator from Utah concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. I am through.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Utah says, Mr. President, that there are precedents for allowing this pension. I suppose that is true, and there may be other similar cases in this bill; but since I have been on the Committee on Pensions I have never consented to one knowingly.

The difficulty is that in this bill there are many pages of names, and in some of the other pension bills there are even many more. The Committee on Pensions can not sit as a body and examine these claims. Sixty-five hundred of the cases last approved were passed by the Senate in a purely pro forma way. These pension bills necessarily have to be referred to somebody, and that somebody is a clerk, either in the department or in the committee. He writes out these stories, they are incorporated in the report, and neither the committee, the Senate, nor the other House know what they are doing.

I will say to the Senator from Utah that it has not been with any disposition to oppose the payment of pensions where the claims are just that I have asked to let these matters go over on one or two occasions, but it was in order that I might have an opportunity to find cases that were in plain violation of the solemn statutes of Congress and to try, if I could, to have those cases stricken from the bills.

The Senator from Utah read from the report—drawn up by the committee, shall we say?—which states that this widow is old, poor, and unable to earn a support by manual labor. So, Mr. President, there are hundreds of thousands of widows who are old and poor and unable to earn a living. When we put into a bill a claim such as this we are not doing it upon the ground that the beneficiary was the widow of a soldier. She never married the soldier until 25 years after the war was over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida. This beneficiary belongs to a class who are barred from pension by general law, and individual cases ought not to be singled out and given pensions by special act. There are hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of widows equally as destitute and equally as deserving as this woman, and if legislation is to be had at all it ought to be by a general law which would take care of them all. When I was chairman of the Committee on Pensions it was my endeavor to exclude from consideration all such cases. Possibly some cases of this kind were acted on, but as a general thing they were rejected, as they should be.

Mr. President, a day or two ago I had occasion to answer a letter from a valued friend, who solicited me to introduce a bill pensioning a widow who married a soldier subsequent to the year 1890, and I declined to do so on the ground that the general law specifically denied them pension. Of course I know that Congress can pension anybody; but discrimination ought not to be practiced, as is done in this case. For the reasons stated I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, when the Senator answered the letter as he did he did what the law would have required him to do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. Just a moment. Other Senators would do the same thing. Some few may know that by a special bill we repeal the general law, but neither the Senate, the House, nor anybody else will know anything about it except the clerks who make up the bill. If the proposition ever comes before the Senate to remove the restriction in the law as to the date of marriage, I shall vote against it, because I do not believe, Mr. President, that pensions are paid as a reward for service; I believe the Government has the right to demand the service of the citizen; but if it is to be done at all it ought to be done by general law, so as to have everybody treated alike.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will simply say that I have as a member of the committee always taken the same position as that which has been taken by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in these cases; but this widow is suffering from tuberculosis; she can not live much longer; and so a majority of the committee thought she was entitled to a pension on that account, and that only.

Mr. President, I want the Senate to understand my position upon these questions, for I take the same position as does the Senator, that if there is to be a pension granted to widows who married soldiers after June 27, 1890, it should be granted by a general act, and not by a special act.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator from Utah a question before he takes his seat. I do not know whether or not it can be done under the rules of the Senate, but I will enter a motion in a general way—and the bill can be gone through with to find the cases—to strike from this bill all claims for widows married since June 27, 1890.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that would not be a proper motion to make.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, we will simply have to take the time to look into these matters. We can not bring in a bill with a report embodying a hundred pages, and expect Senators to read it in a day.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that there are very few such cases ever reported either to the House or to the Senate.

Mr. BRYAN. That is not the only ground upon which pensions ought not to be paid, in my opinion or in the Senator's opinion. The Senator knows, and I know, that it is impossible for him or any other individual Senator, without taking hours of time, to go through one of these reports.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that almost every case has been gone through with by the Committee on Pensions, and passed upon. I will admit that the reports are not written by the individual members of the committee, but the reports, Mr. President, are read at the committee meetings; and if there are objections they are always considered by the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah intends to be entirely accurate, but the Senator certainly must know that only one Senator considers the bills referred to him, and the committee as a body does not know what those bills are.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is understood by every member of the committee that if there is anything in the report contrary to the rules of the committee it is to be brought to the attention of the committee, and it is just such cases as this that are brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator whether anybody brought his attention to this item.

Mr. SMOOT. The item was brought to the attention of the committee. As I remember, this very case was voted upon by the committee, and a majority of the committee voted to put it in the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not remember that I was ever present when the committee has voted by a majority to put these claims in these bills.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, I will say to the Senator that I have been voted down a number of times on this very proposition.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question. I agree with him on this proposition; but I should like to ask him if there is any difference, as far as law is concerned, between voting a pension to the widow of this soldier and voting a sum to the widow of a Senator?

Mr. BRYAN. No, Mr. President; and I really do not think we have the right to do either.

Mr. KENYON. Why do we not stop both, then?

Mr. BRYAN. I will stop as soon as the Senator does. We can begin to stop both to-day if he says so. The Senator need not lecture me about that, because he stood on the floor of the Senate three or four days ago in favor of a claim——

Mr. KENYON. On the theory that the father is as much entitled to it as the widow. I distinctly stated that I was against the entire proposition.

Mr. BRYAN. I am at a loss to know why my good-natured friend from Iowa proceeds to deliver me a lecture on that subject at this particular juncture.

Mr. KENYON. I am not lecturing at all. I am merely making the suggestion, and agreeing with the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have not been able to make as close an inspection of these bills and the items constituting them as is necessary to a complete and intelligent discussion of them. There are a number of them upon the calendar. As far as my inspection of them has gone, they seem to have been made up by selecting bills in behalf of individuals living in different parts of the Union, so that when presented as an omnibus bill it embodies applications from nearly every State in the Union.

If this were conspicuous in only one of the bills, I should regard it as merely a coincidence; but as it seems to be characteristic of nearly all of them, the impression I gather is that these selections are so made for the purpose of getting a majority back of the bills in both Houses, since Senators and Representatives dissatisfied with specific items would be disinclined to vote against them, as they contain benefits to their own constituents whom they would naturally incline to favor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I am rather surprised at that statement on the part of the Senator. I do not think he ought to make it as a charge against the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not making it as a charge against the committee. I am simply defining what seems to be a practice with reference to these bills which began long before this committee was in existence.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to tell the Senator exactly how the bills are prepared.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me say, before the Senator proceeds, that if the impression I have gathered about the composition of these bills is incorrect, I certainly wish to be set right.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is hardly a Senator in this body who does not introduce bills for the relief of soldiers or sailors of the Civil War.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; and I have introduced my proportion.

Mr. SMOOT. The bills, of course, are considered not because of the fact that they are from any particular State, but they are considered and the reports written by men in the employ of the Pensions Committee for the purpose of looking up the facts in the case as they really exist. I desire to say to the Senator that the committee never asks a word as to whether the bill is from the West or the East or the North or the South. That matter never is taken into consideration. It is very likely to happen, of course, in considering bills as they have been introduced in this body, that they come from all sections of the country. I wish to assure the Senator, however, that there never has been since I have been on the Pensions Committee any program mapped out by the committee to take so many bills from the East and so many from the West and so many from the North and so many from the South.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course I accept and give full credit to the statement of the Senator from Utah, and I desire to thank him for setting me right upon the situation. I think I can generally rely upon the experiences of my friend the Senator with reference to Senate and committee procedure, and of course I stand corrected as to this impression. But, Mr. President, the explanation given by the Senator from Utah to the item specifically objected to by the Senator from Florida to my mind is the one which can be largely, if not almost universally, applied to the approval of many of these claims. The Senator is a man of a sympathetic disposition, and cases of need appeal very strongly to his generous nature. I have no doubt that the fact that this particular claimant is in bad health and with few days to live appealed to him very much more strongly than the legal aspect of the case could have done.

Much as I sympathize with and commend the exhibition of that creditable element of human nature, I do not believe, in the discharge of our duties here, we should allow it to influence our action in the disposition of the public revenues. If a bill were introduced here providing a method of pensioning all deserving and meritorious survivors of the Civil War, or the widows of those who served in that war, in a general scheme of legislation, I should be strongly inclined to support it; not that the Government has not already been overgenerous but because their necessitous conditions would justify such action. Indeed, when it comes to that, the matter of pensioning those who have lived to an age where they can not support themselves, whether soldiers of war or of peace, which Great Britain some time ago adopted, has always appealed to me.

I do not, however, think it is wise or just to enact by special laws so many exceptions from the general operation of our pension laws, because it makes them largely inefficacious for the purposes which, when enacted, they were designed to subserve. A man or a woman outside of the privileges granted by those laws seems to be just as well off through special bills as though included in the general law; and those who have applied unsuccessfully to the Pension Bureau at once come here, file their applications, and are given full consideration, notwithstanding the liberal character of the provisions of our pension laws.

Mr. President, the item of expense is a tremendous factor in the system of pensioning the survivors of our wars. This Nation pays annually for this purpose an enormous sum of money, and the amount seems to grow in inverse proportion to the deaths of those upon the lists. At the expiration of a half-century period, after the close of the war, the amount which we appropriate and pay for pensions is enormously larger than it was a quarter of a century before, and it is constantly increasing. It seems to me that if an applicant under the general laws is unable, notwithstanding their liberal provisions, to secure a pension, prima facie at least, he is not entitled to one, and as a consequence these cases should be scanned very closely and as few exceptions as possible made to the general rule.

Of course when one reaches the age of threescore and ten the infirmities of nature are inevitable. That is the allotted period of life, and those who live beyond it must expect to encounter those physical infirmities and diseases which are inseparable from old age. I notice, however, that in many of these specific instances men past the age of 70 and suffering from the natural consequences of old age trace the origin of their infirmities to service for their country away back in the years 1861–1865. It would seem that the fact that a man survives beyond the allotted period of life is the best possible evidence that he escaped the dangers of disease in service. Yet take the great majority of instances here, where it having been impossible under the liberal provisions of our general pension laws for the applicant to obtain any relief, the certificates of physicians and the testimony of friends and neighbors are furnished the committee declaring that these physical difficulties had their origin in the exposures and hardships consequent upon service in the Army. In some cases that may be so. Each of these cases should stand upon its own merits, and instead of lumping a large number of cases in an omnibus bill we should consider and determine them in their order.

Of course I know it will be said, and said with much reason, that the time of the Senate can not be occupied with the consideration of so many measures; but that objection concedes the evil of this whole system of special legislation. Special legislation has no place in the general legislative scheme of this Government. Of course the practice exists; it is constitutional, but it should be limited as far as possible to the area of absolute necessity, and then there would be comparatively little of it.

The work of nearly all of our committees is devoted as much, if not more, to the consideration of private bills seeking relief of different sorts than to the great measures of general importance which we are supposed to be here to consider and to legislate upon.

The evil is growing. It is growing constantly. I can not say with precision how many bills have been introduced so far in this Congress, but I do not think I overstate it when I say that in both Houses there are probably 20,000, of which it is safe to assert 50 or 60 per cent consist of personal bills for all conceivable purposes.

Of course Senators and Representatives are expected and required to give more attention and more concern to these special bills, which are introduced at the instance of their constituents, than to the great questions which are inevitably involved in the general legislation of the country, in carrying out party platforms and party pledges, and in performing those things which, in the scheme of this country's general frame of government, were designed to compose the chief principal portion of congressional duties.

It may be that each item of these bills is trivial in itself. Nevertheless, the fact is that each increase, however small, in the general mass of national expenditures, increases the burden upon the people. We are apt to overlook and to pay no attention to them, but in their aggregate they amount to a very large sum.

I have already adverted to the fact that the party now in power not only denounced Republican extravagance in its last platform, but pledged itself to an economical administration of affairs, and, among other things, to a reduction of the number of governmental appointees. At the time I did so the Senate had under consideration the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and it was then insinuated that Senators who desired to disclose their regard for economy were prone to select the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the purpose and to attack it under the pretense of a desire to minimize the appropriations of the Government.

I said then, Mr. President, as I say now, that in my judgment it is the duty of the Democratic Party to observe and apply its pledge not alone to the great appropriation bills essential to the operation of governmental affairs but to all measures designed to secure appropriations from the Treasury, large or small.

TRADING IN COTTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 110

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. KERN, and Mr. SAULSBURY answered to their names when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill for a little explanation of its phraseology. I presume there is a reason for it which I do not comprehend at present. Section 1 reads:

That no person, firm, joint-stock company, society, association, or corporation, their managers or officers, who are members of any exchange, society, corporation, or association in which or through which any contract or contracts for the future delivery of cotton are made shall send or receive through the United States mail any letter, document, pamphlet, or other matter unless such exchange, society, corporation, or association shall require all such contracts for future delivery of cotton to specify the grade or grades contracted for in each and every contract.

In section 3 the phraseology is:

That whoever shall send or receive any letter, paper, publication, or package, or matter of any kind through the mails of the United States contrary to the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

I do not see how any man can possibly put himself in a position where he will not receive a letter on any subject that anyone chooses to write him about. I would be glad if the Senator would explain to me how we are to be exempt from this fine and imprisonment if, in the due course of business, we receive letters on this particular subject.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator will find the explanation of his question in the first section. The bill applies to a member of a corporation, and this section applies to those individuals who are either the agents or members or are connected with those who are doing this particular kind of business. The object is to keep those who are engaged in this business, who do not conform to the provisions in the first section, from receiving or sending any communication whatever until they do conform thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can understand why they might be inhibited from sending, but I can not conceive of any statute that could possibly prevent a man from receiving. But section 3 is broader than the Senator puts it. It says, "whoever shall send or receive any letter, paper, publication, or package." It does not even provide that they shall belong to these societies or associations, or whatever they may be.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That, of course, is true, and proper wording can be suggested to restrict it to the class intended to be reached. I hope that in the course of my speech I will explain to the Senator fully what the terms of the bill mean, and there are perhaps certain amendments that will be added.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that the Senator has quite a task before him to explain how it can be that a man, whether he is a member of the society or not, can be fined and imprisoned for receiving a letter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think I shall show the Senator that under a law we now have, to which I shall at the proper time refer, known as the Sherman anti-trust law, men who are engaged in legitimate business, from every standpoint except a purely technical one, were imprisoned for a less offense than would be the offense of one who under the provisions of this act might ignore entirely the requirements of the provision and in defiance thereof send and receive letters from others.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he starts in his speech. I presume the object of the bill is to preclude members of this organization from using the United States mail at all?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Unless they conform to the provisions of the act.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. That might be proper and effective in a sense; if they were members of a criminal combination or one that Congress saw fit to make a criminal combination so far as they themselves are concerned in sending out mail, but this says if a man is a member of it he shall be fined and imprisoned if he receives a letter. Is it the intention of the Senator to make the receiving of a letter which has been sent to a man without connivance upon his part under those conditions also punishable?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The object of that section is to shut the mails to any member of one of these exchanges which have through all this period of time been, according to the testimony I shall read here, parties to a practice which has gone to such an extent that, while in its incipiency it was bad, the practice grew worse until all those engaged in the business outside of these exchanges have risen up in protest against it. I would not shut the United States mails absolutely to one who was seeking to conform to the rules of right and square dealing as outlined in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. I simply desired to get the intent of it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was the intent of it.

Mr. President, there is perhaps no commodity that is fraught with as much interest to the American people as this question and possibly none as little understood and appreciated. The Members of the Senate ought to know, as perhaps most of them do know, that the balance of trade of this country with foreign countries depends entirely upon our exportation of raw cotton. It has grown from two to three million bales in 1860 to between fourteen and sixteen million bales in the last decade.

The practice of selling cotton—the method by which it is sold—is peculiar. Possibly it is the only commodity in this country that is sold under such peculiar methods as those which characterize the sale of cotton. The method has become established so thoroughly that we are absolutely dependent upon these exchanges for the fixing of the price of our cotton. That is the reason for the introduction of this bill, and it is our hope to regulate this method.

I have heard discussions here on the floor as to the regulation of our interstate traffic, as to the regulation of commerce, but none of these forms of corporations and organizations have taken from the people profits that the people as producers were entitled to. Common carriers and manufacturers may have charged and doubtless do charge exorbitant prices for services rendered, but the cotton exchanges really take from the producers the profits to which the producers are entitled.

In 1870 the New York Cotton Exchange was organized under the laws of the State of New York. On the New York Cotton Exchange from January 1 to August 1, 1869, the sales of future contracts were 101,663 bales, and the spot sales were 673,563 bales. In 1870, as I said a moment ago, the New York Cotton Exchange organized, and a form of contract was adopted. During that year the future sales were 591,556 bales, and the spot sales were 616,410 bales. One year later, after they were duly incorporated, organized, and got fairly into the business, and got the idea of the future contracts, in the same market the sales of futures were 3,000,000 bales and the spot sales 733,905 bales.

Since that time the sales of spot cotton have dropped to a negligible quantity. No statistics have been kept accurately, but it is alleged that the sale of spot cotton during the last year was something over 200,000 bales, while for the last few years the sales of futures have amounted to from 300,000,000 to 400,000,000 bales.

It might not have been that this would have had a disastrous effect upon the market had it not been that cotton being particularly susceptible of falling into grades, these grades were used as a basis upon which a form of contract grew that ultimately has robbed the section that produced cotton out of millions, and threatens now to demoralize the manufacturing interests and to play into the hands of the export trade which carries our cotton abroad.

In order that those who are to vote upon this measure may understand the practice that has grown up, I want to call attention to the fact that cotton is divided into certain grades on account of color, foreign matter, and strength of the fiber.

The practice of "fixed differences" is a comparatively recent practice. Previous to 1888 in the New York market and the New Orleans market, which were practically the only two that bought and sold future cotton, in these markets each grade of cotton was bought and sold upon the market value of each grade. That means that if there were a plethora of the lower grades the price of those grades in comparison with the higher grades would fall. If there happened to be a shortage in the lower grades and a relative increase in the higher grades, then the higher grades would come nearer to a parity in price with the lower grades.

This being true, anyone who bought a contract on the markets prior to 1888 had the privilege of selecting in a measure the grade that he would receive upon his contract, in spite of the fact that it was sold even then upon what was known as the basis grade.

In 1888 New York adopted what was known as the fixed difference; that is, they would take as the basis the middle grade, called middling. There were so many grades below that of less value than middling, and so many grades above that of greater value than middling. They would fix the relative value of those below for a period of time and the value of the grades above in the same way. Thus when a party bought a contract, say of 100 bales, his contract read that the seller should have the option of delivering him any grade tenderable under the rules of the exchange at a difference fixed by the exchange, and he had to take that grade or retender it and settle upon margin.

Mr. President, it is important that those Senators who are here shall understand this method of fixed difference, also the practice of tendering any grade upon contract that is tenderable under the rules of the exchange. So obnoxious, so absolutely unfair and untenable had this matter become in 1907 that Congress passed a resolution appointing a committee to investigate the contracts and practices of the exchanges and report to this body. I read on page 19 of the report of Commissioner Herbert Knox Smith in reference to the practice of the "fixed difference." I hope that the Senators here will get the idea of that clearly in their minds, because that is the important point that we are attempting to eliminate by this bill, and also to restrict them to the legitimate sale of cotton according to its merits. On page 19 the commissioner says:

> Fixed differences are an attempt substantially to render future transactions a "sure thing" for a limited class of speculative experts. The system amounts to an attempt absolutely to fix prices—an economic absurdity. The relative values of different grades are as much subject to the natural laws of supply and demand as the value of middling cotton itself, and it is as unreasonable to attempt to fix one by the fiat of a committee as it is the other.
> The result of this attempt, as above shown, is to affect the basis price that is paid for future contracts. The law of supply and demand, unable to work directly on these fixed differences, works itself out indirectly on the basis price of the contract; but this indirect action results in great loss to a vast body of persons who are not experts and who do not understand this artificial machinery or its results. By compelling operators in futures to consider probable conflicts between the two sets of differences, as well as possible variations in the price of middling cotton itself, an unnecessary increase in trading risks is introduced. This is clearly an evil. The system results in shifting the burden of risk from a limited class of experts to a nonspeculative class, or to those ignorant of the working of the system. A premium is thus put on intelligence applied to artificial conditions, which of course is of no service to the public, rather than on intelligence applied solely to forecasting the actual conditions of supply and demand. In the same way, the system tends to shift the burden of risk from sellers upon buyers. Clearly a great advantage is given the seller from the fact that he can offer on contract any grade he chooses. He should not have both this privilege and the privilege of arbitrarily fixed differences, which almost invariably overvalue certain grades. The result of the combination of the two is to give the seller an extremely unfair advantage over the buyer.

This means that in New York to-day this absurd condition exists. What we mean by "spots" is the cotton in bales in the warehouses, where a buyer can go and select his grade and pay his money for it directly upon selection. If he were to buy "middling," the actual cotton, he would pay from $5 to $6 a bale more than he would pay for "middling cotton," March contract in futures in the same market. The price of cotton in the South is fixed not by the "spot" quotation of the exchanges, but by the quotation for the basic grade "middling" in New York future market. Therefore, the price is depressed by virtue of the exchanges having a large stock of unmerchantable, undesirable cotton, kept for the purpose of tendering on contracts. So if you or I go there to buy 100 bales basic "middling," say, at 10 cents, and having to receive in settlement "good ordinary" at 9 cents a pound, when the commercial world will only give 7 cents a pound, you or I stand to lose $10 per bale on the purchase. Therefore, if you or I mean to take up cotton through the exchange, the next time we bid we do not bid with reference to the value of "middling," but with reference to the "fixed difference" between what the grade of cotton you are going to receive is actually worth, and the price that you bid on "middling." To illustrate: If the trade will give 7 cents for "good ordinary" and "middling" is worth 12 cents, and the fixed difference between the two—fixed arbitrarily by the exchange—is 1 cent, then I bid for "middling" 8 cents, in order that when I receive the "ordinary" I shall receive it at 7 cents without a loss. Then it is flashed all over the country that "middling" cotton in New York has dropped to 8 cents a pound. The buyers on the local, the primary country market, keeping track with the ticker, mercilessly fleece the millions engaged in the production of this stuff to such an extent that there has never yet been an approximately fair market since the fixed difference system has been in vogue.

The argument has been used that a contract is a contract, and that we have no right to come into the Senate of the United States or into the other House and attempt to regulate a business that technically is begun and completed within one State. I am as strong an advocate of State rights as there is on the floor of the Senate, but when it comes to a question of a business that affects all the people alike, such as our interstate commerce, such as commodities that must be shipped back and forth between States, I think the Congress of the United States should step in and regulate, as far as possible, in equity and justice the practices of these exchanges for the benefit of all engaged. In reference to this point the commissioner says:

> The reply of certain interests in the New York Exchange is that "a contract is a contract;" that men who deal there come of their own will and are supposed to understand the game. This position can not commend itself as sound business ethics. Practically, also, it is not true that cotton interests are wholly at liberty to stay out of the exchange. As shown above, certain interests must have a hedging place. Furthermore, financial connections with New York are so close that New York must be that place for many of them. Still further, the New York Cotton Exchange practically owes its existence to the volume of business made possible by the participation of outside interests. Both the duty of a private business man to his customers and the duty of a concern which is to a certain extent a public utility demand fair dealing.

This is the report of the commissioner. Further, with reference to the same matter, he says:

> It is contended by many that such a return to the commercial difference system—

That is, to the real differences of the grades that are regulated by the law of supply and demand would ruin the New York Exchange—

> It is contended by many that such a return to the commercial-difference system would, because of the disadvantages of New York's location, destroy the business of the New York Cotton Exchange. There is little reason to believe that any such result would occur. However this may be, the New York Cotton Exchange, if it can not exist under a just and equitable system, has no excuse for existence at all. The present New York system of fixed differences is uneconomic, in defiance of natural law, unfair, and, like all other attempts to defy natural law, results in such complex and devious effects that the benefit of its transactions accrues only to a skilled few.

I incorporate this because it covers so clearly and splendidly the points that are at issue. In fixing these differences they are fixed for a period of time, as I have said, and during that period it makes no difference whether the volume of one grade is so great that it should result in a lowering of the price of that grade or whether it is so scarce that it should result in the raising of the price of that grade. The differences remain fixed.

In 1906–7 a great scandal arose in New York on the ground that certain members who were short on cotton, that is certain ones who had sold, and not owning the cotton, but expected in the open market either to obtain it or in the future markets to cover their contracts by a purchase which would relieve them from loss, it was alleged that certain members of the Exchange, members of the grade committee, or influential members of the grade committee, had so fixed the difference as to give these the power, not only to come out from under their contracts without loss, but to fleece the public. Here is what the commissioner says in reference to that:

> In the opinion of many members of the cotton trade intentional abuse of trust by revision committees, or at least by individual members of such committees, has been a common occurrence in New York. Substantially the charge is that a clique of New York spot merchants have had a predominating voice in the management of the New York Cotton Exchange, and consequently in the appointment of revision committees; and that they have deliberately abused this power by selling future contracts, and thereafter securing the establishment of differences under which they could deliver certain grades of cotton which they had on hand, or which they contemplated buying in the South, at a relative overvaluation, or of differences which would result in forcing a decline in the contract price, thus enabling them to cover short sales at a profit. It is alleged that certain spot interests in New York have thus systematically "milked" the market and have reaped enormous profits.

Those of us who are vitally interested—and all of us are more or less interested—in this question, recognize the fact that, so long as the exchanges are allowed to sell one thing and deliver another, at a difference in price fixed by the seller, the man who enters that market is at the mercy of the man who owns the machine and runs the system.

The New York Commercial the other day, in speaking of this practice in New York, called it, I believe, "a bunco game," and stated that they blackjacked any man who dared to go there to demand the delivery of cotton.

The commissioner's report goes into such minute details that I shall read another paragraph on this point before going to another phase of the subject. In speaking about the argument for "fixed differences," the commissioner says:

This argument overlooks the vitally important distinction between a basis contract and a specific contract. It is unquestionably true that in ordinary contracts for specific property, such as a piece of real estate, the buyer who agrees to take such property at a future date at a fixed price has no just reason to complain because, after he enters into such a contract, its value declines. It is his business to take the risk of such subsequent change in value. The argument that he should take the entire risk of change in value under a basis contract, however, by no means follows. The option of the seller, under a basis contract, of tendering such grades as he may desire creates a fundamental distinction between such basis contract and a specific contract. The buyer is absolutely unable to know with any degree of certainty what grades of cotton he will be compelled to take. If, in addition, he is compelled to take such unspecified grades at arbitrary values relative to middling, then the contract really assumes much of a gambling character. A contract of this sort, while extremely advantageous to the seller, becomes for the buyer almost a lottery. The seller not only has the privilege of selecting any grades which he may desire to tender, without notifying the buyer what they are, but also has the obvious inducement to select those grades which it will be of the greatest advantage to himself to deliver and usually of the greatest disadvantage to the buyer to receive.

From time to time, Mr. President, there have been bills introduced to remedy this evil, and the thought has been expressed on this floor that the unjust practice of these exchanges, having their fixed differences, as I have attempted to explain, having the privilege of delivering any grade that they may see fit to construe as tenderable upon a contract, from the lowest to the highest, has absolutely for years impoverished and demoralized the cotton trade so far as the farmer is concerned. It is only at the present time that the wheel has turned to the point where the manufacturers and the bankers are beginning to feel the steel hand of this outrageous organization in the greatest industry in America. It had occurred several times before they had felt the effects of this system, but they were soon relieved, as I shall attempt to explain.

I called attention a moment ago to the fact that New York at one time was a "spot" market, having from three to four times as many bales of actual cotton sold as there were of "futures." This market rapidly dropped to the point where less than 2 per cent of its transactions were in "spot" cotton, but those who were averse to any legislation to relieve the farmer were averse for the reason that they claimed that it was a place where they could "hedge;" that it was a "hedge" market. The "hedge" market scheme was worked, and so long as it operated as it was intended to operate, it was a perfect machine for the manipulation of the market in favor of the manufacturer, the speculator, and the gambler, but directly opposed to all the interests of the farmer, as I shall show.

When the contract in New York was used as a "hedge" to suit all parties to the contract, if I bought a hundred bales "basis middling" at 10 cents per pound, and cotton went up $5 a bale, or a cent a pound—that is, to 11 cents—I, the purchaser, of course, made $5 a bale on the contract; if it went down a cent a pound, I lost $5 a bale plus the commission. So long as the "future" market controlled the "spot" market as one went down the other went down and as one went up the other went up, the party hedging was protected.

To illustrate: A given manufacturer has an order for cloth that will consume a thousand bales of cotton. He has no cotton in his warehouse, and the order for cloth is for future delivery. He does not want to lose the order; he wants to place it, and he immediately accepts the order plus the profit that is in it. Cotton, say, is 10 cents a pound. He immediately buys a contract on the New York Cotton Exchange as a hedge. If he buys that hedge at 10 cents a pound and the price in the South fluctuates pari passu, he is in a bombproof; he will lose nothing. Why? He buys a thousand bales in New York; cotton goes up, as I said a moment ago, $5 a bale, or a cent a pound; "spots" in the South go up from 10 to 11 cents a pound or $5 a bale; he takes his profit in New York and adds it to the price of his 10-cent cotton; gives 11 cents for it; fills his cloth order; and maintains his profit. If it goes down a cent a pound he loses $5 in New York; but "spot" cotton in the South has gone down a cent a pound; he buys his "spots" at 9 cents a pound and sells his cloth upon a basis of 10 cents a pound. Consequently he loses nothing and saves his profit. Therefore, so far as he is concerned, he does not give a snap of his finger whether cotton goes up $25 a bale or whether it goes down $25 a bale. He is in a bombproof. But what about the poor devil out on the farm who is producing the raw material when that cotton drops and drops? It is easier always to go downhill than it is to go uphill; it is easier to oppress the poor and helpless than it is to resist the organized rich. If the price of futures went down, as it usually did, and spots went down likewise, what difference did it make to the manufacturer?

If the manufacturer sold his cloth on a basis of 10 cents and was hedged in New York, and cotton went down to 7 cents, he had sufficient profit from the party to whom he sold his goods between 7 and 10 cents to protect him. If, perchance, cotton went up 3 cents a pound, he made $15 a bale on his hedge. He had to pay $15 more for his spot cotton; he took his profit from his hedge and added it to what he had to pay for the cotton in the South and was still in his bombproof.

That is the way in which the producer of cotton has been made to suffer. We have had no friends except the disorganized poverty-stricken producers of the South who, by virtue of the exigencies of a terrible war, with our credit gone and our capital gone, with no way to organize our own exchanges and no way to finance our crops, have been absolutely at the mercy of the machinations of this machine. In later years, however, a somewhat different condition has arisen, which in a way has affected the manufacturers. I bring no railing accusation against any man who in a legitimate way takes care of himself.

Cotton has become universally necessary; its consumption has increased from 2,000,000 bales in 1864 to 16,000,000 bales in 1911; its value rising from a few million dollars in 1860 to practically $1,000,000,000 in 1913 and 1914. The consumption of cotton in America has risen to the point where one-third of the crop is consumed in this country and millions of dollars are invested in the Northern, in the Eastern, and in the Southern States for the conversion of this article into the finished product. Nine hundred millions of people use in some form American cotton; and by virtue of the improvements in machinery, it has entered the domain of every other textile that is used in ordinary consumption, and has practically driven them from the field. Take wool; it has a peculiar adaptation, and you can not force it out of that; silk is of such fine and attenuated fiber that it is silk and nothing else; flax is of such a peculiar nature that it is flax and nothing else, whereas American upland cotton, plus our Gulf cotton, has entered the domain of each of these, and it is not only a competitor to, but is a splendid substitute for them. Under the loose weaving and the aniline dyes, it takes an expert to tell the difference between a piece of woolen goods and a piece of cotton goods; under the mercerized process it is a fine substitute for silk; and under the modern tight weave and modern laundry it has practically driven flax out of the field; so that the human family would not greatly suffer, if we had an adequate supply of cotton, if flax, wool, and silk were not in existence. So great has become its use, so universal and necessary has it become to the human family, under the splendid improvement in transportation and in communication, that we of America to-day, holding a monopoly of this wonderful article, in the face of all the world, have a right to say that it becomes the patriotic duty of every American and of every man in the Congress of the United States to see to it that those who produce cotton in America and those who handle it shall do so under the fairest and most equitable laws which can be devised.

As I have said, the manufacturing interests have become so stupendous and great both in Europe and in this country that cotton is an article second to none in the commerce of the world. The manufacturers are now as much interested as the producers are in seeing that they as well as the producers shall not become the victims of this system.

I want to call the attention of Members of the Senate to what the manufacturers are saying now in reference to the effect that the manipulation of the market has on the sale of their goods—and this is a vitally important point—I want to call the attention of Members of the Senate to what effect this practice on the New York Exchange of absolutely manipulating the market and quoting the prices of grades of cotton below actual value has upon the sale of American manufactured goods. In this report the commissioner says:

In this connection it may be noted that a member of a spinners' committee, which met a special committee of the New York Cotton Exchange, said:

"We are interested in export goods and we are right up against it in the China trade because there is a demand made by reason of your quotations. Your quotations are flashed over the world; they are known in Shanghai a short time after they are known here in New York and we have not an opportunity to explain to these Chinese buyers that the quotation here of 11 cents for January cotton does not represent the actual value of cotton or the value of cotton we can buy for two or three months; yet they keep on insisting on 9 (11) cents as the value of cotton when in the South we are paying 12 cents, and that is one trouble with the Chinese market to-day."

In other words, when "spots" have refused to go down with "futures," then the future price of the different grades is flashed abroad, as well as quoted here in our country, so that the manufacturer can not place his goods. This occurred in 1907, and this year, I am informed, that for the second or third time this condition has arisen: Certain interests in New York, on the exchange, have committed themselves to short sales for perhaps more than a million bales of cotton, at a price at which they can not buy the "spots" to fill the contracts. The result is that, on account of the great demand for cotton, and the comparative scarcity of it, and the further fact that it has now passed out of the hands of the farmer and is being held by strong hands who really know the value of it and the demand for it, "future" cotton in New York has dropped from a cent and a half to two cents a pound below the value of "spot" cotton in the different markets of the country. The result is that those mills that are attempting to hedge by buying contract cotton in New York against their purchase of "spots" in the South have been absolutely sacrificed, because "futures" went down while "spots" stood at the same level. It is bad enough for them to lose. I am not pleading for them on that score. This is one time when New York has ceased to be a hedge and has caused a loss to the manufacturer. The worst feature of it, however, is this:

The legitimate manufacturer, who may or may not have hedged his contracts for the delivery of cloth by the purchase of a contract of cotton in New York, goes to place his contracts for export or domestic sale. The jobber, the wholesaler, the man who is to purchase his cloth, asks for quotations. The manufacturer gives him the quotations. The purchaser knows immediately, from the quality of the cloth, what ought to be the price of the raw material. He says: "You are offering me this cloth at a price that would justify 13¼ or 14 cents a pound for that cotton in the spot." The manufacturer says: "That is just what I have to give for it." The purchaser says: "Well, here is a New York quotation at 11 cents. Do you suppose I am going to put in a contract for cloth based upon 13½ cents when the futures are 11½ cents?" Consequently, right now, at the time of placing the orders with the mills throughout the country, they are up against the proposition that they can not place them, because of the unjust and unwarrantable difference there is between the future market and the spot market.

There have been introduced here by different Senators letters complaining that their mills can not sell their goods on account of this unjustifiable and disastrous condition that exists in New York. I have here a letter from a gentleman in New York. He says I can use it. I shall put the whole letter in the RECORD, but I shall just read the last paragraph, in reference to the cause of the acute depression just now, and the difference between spots and futures. He says:

I am told that there is a speculative straddle account between here and Liverpool, the short end of which is here and amounts to something over a million bales. That is why this market has been forced down by the might of dollars. Now this end of the straddle has to be bought in. If that measure of yours is made to read that it will go into effect immediately, there will be a scramble here to bring in the shorts that would result in an advance in all the markets and would profit the South over $30,000,000 on the balance of this crop.

What he means by that "straddle" is this: Certain exporters have committed themselves to Europe to the amount of a million or more bales at a price that they can not buy the cotton in for. Therefore their only hope and their only recourse is to use the miserable fixed difference obtaining in New York and depress the market to a point where they can fill their contracts without loss. This has resulted in the absurdity of spot cotton in New York at 13 cents and future cotton of the same grade at 12 cents. The effect of this will tend to lower spots in the South, to depress the primary and local markets. They hope thus to gather in enough cotton in the local markets to make up for their short sales; to overcome the straddle; to deliver to Europe spot cotton at a price far below its real value to fill the contracts to which they have committed themselves. They did not own the spot cotton at the time of the sale of those contracts, and they dared not go into the open market and fight it out along the line of the law of supply and demand.

Mr. President, we who are so vitally interested in this matter have not come here for the purpose of ruining any man's legitimate business; but I, for one, do plead with the Senate to help us ruin the business of those who will not do a legitimate business. I do not wish to destroy a market place in this country, but I do want to drive out those who prostitute the market place. I want to make it by law as easy as possible for those engaged in the business to do right, and as hard as possible for them to do wrong.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him a question or two with reference to the proposed substitute, which I understand is the pending question.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And I want the Senator to understand the spirit in which I ask the questions.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator, I think, has demonstrated that there is a very real evil here which ought to be remedied; and if there is anything which the Government of the United States can take hold of in the matter I think the Federal Government ought to take hold of it. The Senator's bill provides, however:

That no person, firm, etc., who are members of any exchange, society, corporation, or association in which or through which any contract or contracts for the future delivery of cotton are made shall send or receive through the United States mail any letter, document, pamphlet, or other matter unless such exchange, society, corporation, or association shall require all such contracts for future delivery of cotton to specify—certain things which it is not necessary to stop to read.

If I understand that, the ultimate thing which the Senator desires to accomplish is to enforce conduct upon the part of these firms, persons, and companies which is entirely within the jurisdiction of the State and not within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. In other words, the Federal Government could not pass a law which would enforce, or attempt to enforce, under a specific penalty these provisions in the contract. Therefore the Senator seeks to enforce this conduct upon the part of these persons and companies by denying to them the use of the mails of the United States unless they shall comply with these conditions.

Let me ask the Senator whether he has any precedent for legislation of this character? Does the Senator know any case where Congress has undertaken to enforce a particular sort of conduct upon the part of the citizens of a State by denying to them absolutely the use of the mails?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The lottery case is one. They first denied, as I understand, the use of the mails there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes; the Congress of the United States forbade the use of the mails to carry out a lottery scheme.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not doubt that power at all; and I would have no doubt that we would have the right to say in this sort of legislation that the mails shall be denied to any person for the furtherance of contracts which do not come up to the standard which we lay down. The Senator's bill goes beyond that, however.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, I see the very point he is making.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me pursue it just a moment further. The effect of the Senator's bill is to say that if an exchange, for example, shall fail to provide for these conditions in its contracts, then any person who belongs to that exchange shall be denied the right to send a letter to his wife, that he shall be denied the right to transmit by mail a check to a merchant to pay a bill. It goes entirely beyond what Congress has ever undertaken to do before in any such case.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to say to the Senator——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a word further. We have denied the mails for the circulation of obscene literature. It is a very real evil to print or to sell obscene literature wholly within the limits of a State; but would the Senator say that we ought to pass a law that will deny to any person who has sold a piece of obscene literature the use of the United States mail for all time to come for any purpose not connected with the circulation of the obscene matter?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If he were a member of an organization engaged in the production and sale of obscene literature, I would; surely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not certain that I should want to go that far.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should not hesitate a moment. The distinction between the illustration the Senator uses and the condition that exists here is this: Where an individual perpetrates a specific act which in itself, dissociated from any organization or corporation, is the result of his own immorality, that is one thing; but when he organizes that immorality, puts it into practice, and the source from which it arises is still vile, and Congress prescribes that until he does subscribe to a fair and just method of doing business he shall not send anything through the mail, that is a just requirement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We are undertaking in that indirect way to impose a penalty for doing an act or failing to do an act over which we have no jurisdiction whatever. Now, it seems to me that it would be sufficient to deny the use of the mails for the furtherance of the scheme of which we disapprove. We have not undertaken to deny the use of the mails to a convict serving a term in the penitentiary for the most heinous crime imaginable, because it is entirely aside from the offense which he has committed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the Senator loses sight of the very vital distinction to which I call his attention. If that convict, serving a term of, say, 10 years, was a member of a Black Hand society, and refused to give up his membership, and was still determined to perpetrate his crimes, and was actively engaged in sending out the thing for which he was incarcerated, I certainly would deny him the use of the mail on any account.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator would deny him, of course, the right to use the mail for the furtherance of any such scheme as that; but if we embark in this kind of legislation I do not know where we are going to draw the line. Whenever Congress disapproves of any particular conduct or desires to enforce some line of conduct of which it does approve, are we to be confronted with bills denying the use of the mails to the person who is doing things which we do not approve or refusing to do things which we do approve, which things are wholly outside the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is wholly within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States so to control its postal laws as to serve the best interests of all the people. That is clearly its province because it does, as the Senator says, prohibit sending out obscene matter. That acknowledges the principle that it is going to keep the mail for the best interests of the public at large. The letter that was sent through the mail might have gone from one obscene person to another obscene person, but the privilege of sending it to anyone would be denied. Now, the principle being established Congress says:

> Here are certain conditions that we, in our wisdom, believe under the circumstances are the proper ones. You are a member of an organization which in our judgment does not deal in fair and legitimate contracts. As a penalty, as a motive force to cause you to deal only in legitimate contracts, we not only prohibit the use of the mails for this purpose, but if you do not subscribe to so palpably just and honest conditions as Congress prescribes you shall not, until you sever your connection with it, use the mails at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, we deny the use of the mails for the purpose of sending out obscene literature, but we do not deny to persons who have been sending out obscene literature the use of the mails to send out perfectly clean literature. This bill would deny the use of the mails to a person belonging to such an exchange to receive a newspaper to which he has subscribed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Of course, he is looking at the matter from a strictly legal standpoint, disassociating it from any vital thing that affects us right now, and he does not feel toward it, perhaps, as I do. Suppose the person sending out this obscene literature had been a member of an organization that manufactured and sent out this obscene literature, and was still a member of it, and some one introduced a bill to the effect that not only would we deny him the use of the mails to send out his obscene literature, but so long as he was a member of the organization that did manufacture and send out this obscene literature we would not let him use the mails at all, but the very moment he subscribed to decency and was willing to quit the organization, or to see that it was properly adjusted, we would then extend to him the privilege of the mails.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We never have gone that far up to this moment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. We never have had, perhaps, an occasion where we ought to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We never have gone so far as to deny to a man who is engaged in an improper line of conduct the use of the mails for a perfectly legitimate purpose. We have not undertaken to reform humanity by denying them the use of the mails.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will not argue that point. I have stated my position with reference to it very clearly. It is the intent of it to place a penalty upon those who have practiced and are still practicing what is so scathingly denounced by the commissioner, and what every man in the business knows is a fact, to say to them:

> If you will conform to a legitimate, fair, equitable contract we will not prohibit the use of the mails at all, even for sending out of your contracts; but if you do not, if you still hold on to that organization, and still refuse to subscribe to this, then we will deny to you entirely the use of the mails.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator another question. Is there a law in the Senator's own State which compels contracts of the character described in this bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There are no future markets in my State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A contract for the future delivery of products which does not contain the provisions enforced by this bill would be a legal contract under the law of South Carolina; would it not?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I think not. I think it is a fraud. It is in my State.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; and it is so considered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is there a law in the State of South Carolina on that point?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; that you can not enforce it under the law. You can not sue and collect under a contract the nature of which is purely a gambling transaction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If a contract is made that does not contain these elements?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, it has no reference to that; but any contract for the future delivery of cotton based entirely upon marginal settlements can not be collected in our courts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was not quite the question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. The question I asked was whether or not there was a law which provided that the contracts should contain these particular provisions.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; there is no law in our State providing what the contract shall contain, because, as I say, we have no contract market there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just one other question. If I understand this bill, it would not only impose a penalty upon the corporation or the exchange which had complete control over the matter, but it would impose the same penalty upon any person who happened to be a stockholder in a corporation, or a member of the exchange, no matter whether the conduct of the exchange——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I do not think the Senator reads the language correctly. It says the officers or those who are members of any exchange or corporation organized to buy or sell these contracts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let us read it, eliminating the immaterial part of it so far as this question is concerned:

> That no person * * * who is a member of any exchange, society, corporation, or association in which or through which any contract or contracts for the future delivery of cotton are made shall send or receive through the United States mail any letter * * * unless such exchange—

Not "unless such person," but—> unless such exchange, society, corporation, or association shall require all such contracts—

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is conceivable that the exchange would have the power to require this to be done; but a stockholder might have no control whatever over it, and yet you propose to deny the use of the mail to that stockholder in addition to the corporation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I would deny the use of the mail to anyone who had sufficient influence or was a member of the aggregate which made up the personnel of that exchange. Right on the floor of this Senate the battle has raged around the Sherman antitrust law; it has been said that we have attempted to inflict penalties upon the bodies corporate and not upon the individuals, and we got nowhere, and that whenever we bring it down to where we take the individual and put stripes on him we will get somewhere. I think this is germane.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator will concede that he could not put stripes on a person for doing this thing. The Senator concedes that the Government of the United States would have no power to punish one of these persons by putting him in jail or by imposing a fine on him for failing to do these things; he recognizes that in his own bill by imposing as the penalty the nonuse of the mail, and then punishes him if he uses the mail, not for doing the act which the Senator concedes is beyond the jurisdiction of the Congress——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But I say, not doing that specific act, but using the mails while he is a member of the exchange that does that specific act.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator, he concedes the construction of the Senator from Utah, that if a man were a member of one of these exchanges, and that exchange were engaged in doing certain acts prohibited by this bill, the member of that exchange could not even write a letter to his wife while the exchange continued to violate the law.

It seems to me the Senator hardly could have intended to go that far in this bill; and if he should attempt to go that far, I fear the bill, which has perhaps many excellent features, would be defeated, because it would carry a handicap of that nature. I suggest to the Senator that it would be well to amend the bill so as to limit its operation to the exchange, and to limit its operation as to the members of the exchange to the use of the mails in the furtherance of any of the inhibited practices of the exchange. It seems to me it would be a very drastic remedy in that shape. Surely we could hardly be asked to give our assent to using the power of the Government to deny the mails as a penalty to be imposed like any other penalty in a criminal action. It would hardly be regarded, I think, as sound legislation to provide that if a man stole a horse, he should be sent to the penitentiary, and in addition thereto he should be denied the right to use the mails to write home to his wife. That would be going to an extreme to which I do not believe the Senator means to go.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has taken practically the same ground that the Senator from Utah took when he takes a specific case such as the stealing of a horse and the incarceration of the thief as an illustration of this. The very marked distinction is this: If the individual who stole the horse was a member of an organization whose business it was to send out and steal horses, and to perpetrate and continue the action of stealing horses, and he refused to give up his membership in this rogue's organization, I think the Senator would vote to deny him the privilege of writing to his wife. The point I am making is that so long as he is a member of an organization which will not deal fairly and justly, we, by this penalty, give him this option:

Either you quit using the mails, or you sever your membership, and send out a righteous contract.

Mr. REED. But can not the Senator see that that sort of a penalty is entirely disassociated from the commission of the act?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator explain how it is disassociated?

Mr. REED. Why, certainly. A man is engaged in the practice of some criminal operation. All that he does in the furtherance of that criminal purpose and intent can be properly prohibited, and for anything done in pursuance of that criminal intent he can be appropriately punished. He can be sent to jail, sent to the penitentiary, or fined, and those penalties which usually follow upon the commission of a crime can be visited upon him. It would be a startling thing, however, to say that he can not write a letter to his wife; he can not talk to his children; he can not eat a meal at a restaurant; he can not do any of those things which are in themselves absolutely innocent and in no way connected with any wrongdoing.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Montana, if the Senator from Missouri is through.

Mr. REED. I have not quite finished. I am assuming that the construction placed upon this language by the Senator from Utah is correct, because the Senator from South Carolina concedes it to be correct.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I was about to say that I was unable to give this language any such construction, and thus we are discussing a rather academic proposition here, as it seems to me. The language I have before me reads as follows:

That the use of the mails, telegraphs——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has the wrong bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. We are speaking of the substitute which I will offer immediately upon the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has the wrong bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was just going to ask the Senator if it would not accomplish everything by adding after the word "matter," in line 7, the words "pertaining to the business of such person, association, or corporation," so that the letters which are prohibited would be the letters that pertain to the business of that corporation, because if those are prohibited, as the department would compel them to be prohibited, then, of course, there could be no one to receive those letters. Then we could also strike out the words "or received," and it would seem to me that you would accomplish everything by that amendment without stepping over into a realm in which there might be considerable dispute as to whether it would be a proper policy.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, in view of the discussion that has arisen, I have made my intent clear to the Senate that I will go to the limit to punish individuals engaged in this business and compel them to come to a proper discharge of the function of an exchange. But I am rather inclined to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota. Before that is done, Mr. President, I beg him just to reserve it until I have finished what I have to say on one point to which I wanted to call the attention of Senators.

There is an amendment pending which will be offered and which is very germane, and I will state it. Not only is there a practice that is disastrous to the cotton business in the form of the fixed difference and the unlimited contracts, but where an individual goes to take up the cotton in spite of the fixed difference, if a mill man goes to the exchange upon notice day, as they call it, upon the termination of his contracts and demands the specific fulfillment of his contract the cotton that is certificated that he is to receive is classified and held in the warehouses. This cotton is put into these warehouses regardless of any order from the lowest grade to the highest grade, mixed indiscriminately. The result is that when you receive your order to go into your warehouse to get your cotton, probably to get 500 bales, you will have to wade through, at your own expense, fifteen or twenty thousand bales, and when you have selected what your order calls for you must go to the further expense of having it reclassified and recertificated, and to such an extent is the burden imposed by that means that those who could go and take up this cotton absolutely refuse to go because of the tremendous burden imposed. Therefore, all that New York is used for is a hedging market, as long as it is one, and a gambling market when neither a spot market nor a hedge market like it is to-day.

Mr. President, in behalf of those whom I do represent on this floor I hope that this afternoon we can so perfect the bill that so far as the Senate is concerned we will go on record as giving relief to the farmers, the producers, as well as the manufacturers and the bankers.

I call attention to the fact that the Government under resolutions and in appropriations passed by this body has classified the cotton according to Government standards. It has made nine grades running from "good ordinary" to "middling fair," and I want to tell the Senate that in the tests of the spinning values made by the department the difference between the lowest grade and the highest grade is startlingly less than even the members of firms spinning cotton and the producers of cotton ever dreamed of. So we have come here asking you to knock out this fixed difference and to make it illegal or to deny the use of the mails to those who are doing anything but a commercial business and who we demand shall restrict themselves to the grades as standardized by the Government of the United States. The Government has standardized nine grades.

I believe that in a year or two the Department of Agriculture, carrying on its investigations, will reduce the number of grades from nine to five or possibly only three. That is, to five full grades now. A more thorough test, I believe, will reduce them to the same number of grades used by the Cotton Association of Liverpool, which has only three. It is not fair, it is not right for this body of men to allow such a practice as this to go on, not only because it is injurious to our own trade, but every time the price of cotton goes up 1 cent a pound there is brought into this country from Europe something like $50,000,000. Every time we carry it up 2 cents a pound there is brought into this country $100,000,000, because out of 16,000,000 bales of this crop we export 10,000,000 bales. It is the patriotic duty of every man to preserve the highest legitimate price for cotton.

Therefore I am moved to offer a substitute for Senate bill 110, the substitute which I introduced the other day and which since then has been lying upon the table. There are some amendments which will be offered to it which those who wish to perfect the substitute will desire to discuss.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from South Carolina that his amendment is not now in order, because there are committee amendments reported to the bill and they have not been acted upon.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move this as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then what would be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Action upon the amendments of the committee is first in order.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then I move that the committee amendments be adopted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I feel a very great sympathy for the object the Senator from South Carolina has in view, and in the interruption which he permitted me to make I set forth objections to the form of this amendment. I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that under this bill if a man was a stockholder in an exchange that was violating these rules he would lay himself liable to fine and imprisonment in the penitentiary if he wrote a letter to the president of the exchange protesting against the continuance of the rule, and if the president of the exchange himself believed the rule was wrong——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, I have already said that I would accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. REED. Just a moment. If the president of the exchange were himself desirous to have the rules changed to conform to the law, he could not send out a notice calling the board of directors together to change the rule. The Senator did say that he would accept an amendment which was offered here orally by the Senator from North Dakota, but that amendment has not been incorporated, and the Senator following the suggestion offered his bill as a substitute.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; the Senator does not understand the relation between the two measures. The first bill is the one reported from the committee. I then revised that and offered it as a substitute for the one reported by the committee. When the substitute is before the Senate, such amendments as the Senate sees fit may be placed upon it.

Mr. REED. It seems to me, then, before offering the substitute it would be very well to write the amendment in and offer it as perfected. I am making this suggestion in all kindliness of feeling to the Senator's bill. I do not want to see it defeated——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will adopt that suggestion and ask the Senator from North Dakota to offer his amendment.

Mr. REED. I do not want to see it defeated by reason of the incorporation of language which would compel some of us to vote against it because of that particular language. I simply make the suggestion, and that is all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. It is in order now to adopt the committee amendments to the original bill, and then, when they shall have been adopted, it would be in order to substitute the proposed substitute offered by me.

Mr. OVERMAN. The original bill of the Senator denied the use of the mails to persons making these contracts, but it did not go as far as the substitute.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will remedy that defect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from South Carolina that the Chair understands the rule to be that after the committee amendments are acted upon then if there are any other amendments to the text of the bill they are to be acted upon, and after that the amendment offered as a substitute may be acted upon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I wish to make a single observation, if I may be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not want anything that I said in the course of my colloquy with the Senator from South Carolina to be construed as in any way antagonistic to the principle which he seeks to accomplish.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But in line with what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has suggested with reference to the final effect of this bill, I simply want to make this further suggestion, that if this method of compelling people to conform to the conduct which the Congress approves were generally resorted to we might in the future be confronted with this sort of a situation. There are a great many people who believe in prohibition. There are a great many people in this country who think that no man ought to be permitted to drink any kind of intoxicating liquor. If that sentiment should finally predominate in Congress, then we could pass a law denying the right of the mails to any person who consumes intoxicating liquor, and thereby finally prevent him from even corresponding with a Keeley Institute for the purpose of bringing about his own reformation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think we are all agreed, certainly on this side, as to the substitute proposed by myself for the original bill with the committee amendments therein. Would it be in order for me to move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the original bill and offer this as a substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that is not the rule. If the Senator from South Carolina, on behalf of the committee, offers his bill as a report by way of a substitute, it is in order.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is the condition of affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then it is in order.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then I offer it as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That no person, firm, joint-stock company, society, association, or corporation, their managers or officers, who are members of any exchange, society, corporation, or association in which or through which any contract or contracts for the future delivery of cotton are made shall send or receive through the United States mail any letter, document, pamphlet, or other matter unless such exchange, society, corporation, or association shall require all such contracts for future delivery of cotton to specify the grade or grades contracted for in each and every contract; and shall further specify that such grade as is, or grades as are, contracted for shall be according to United States Government standardization. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to standardize the grades of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately; and such grades as are established for both "upland" and "gulf" cottons shall not include cotton below good ordinary or above middling fair. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture also to standardize according to grades, stains, and tinges.

SEC. 2. That in case long-staple cottons are bought or sold for future delivery the length of the staple shall be designated in the contract, and the cotton shall be, when delivered, as of the grade and length of staple designated in the contract.

SEC. 3. That whoever shall send or receive any letter, paper, publication, or package, or matter of any kind through the mails of the United States contrary to the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. MCCUMBER. If it is desired that the Secretary shall read my amendment, I think it would follow the word "matter," on line 7 of the first page. After the word "matter" insert "pertaining to the business of such person, company, association, or corporation."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not this language really meet the situation——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator from Utah asks me whether the business referred to might not be private business, but it states just above that it is the business of making contracts for the future delivery of cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not meet the suggestion or criticism of the Senator if, after the word "matter," we insert "relating to such future contract or contracts"?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That will cover it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that would really be better than the amendment I suggested.

Mr. REED. I think the words "relating to such contract" would not do. Suppose a stockholder wrote to protest against the making of the contract, the language would cover it. If the language "in furtherance of making any such contract" were used, or some similar term, it would meet the point; but if you use the term "in relation to," you have used an expression which might prohibit a protest against a thousand things which can be imagined relating to it, and yet they might be quite innocent and highly proper. I think it ought to be modified further.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It seems to me that there would be so few letters of that kind which might be interfered with that the object of the measure would be reached. While there might possibly be a letter interfered with that we would not desire to interfere with, it is reduced to so small a number that the evil is almost an impossible one.

If the Senator from Missouri will perfect the sentence in a way that he thinks is better and submit it to the Senator from South Carolina, I know he would be glad to consider it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. After second thought I think the amendment which I proposed would better accomplish what the Senator from South Carolina wishes, and that is that the mails be prohibited to companies or corporations pertaining to the business in any respect, whether it pertains to just that particular contract of future delivery or not, the desire being to shut off the mails to the business of that corporation. If the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia were adopted, it would be limited only to such letters as pertain to the contracts for future delivery, which, I understand, does not go to the extent desired by the Senator from South Carolina.

Let me just read it as it would read with the amendment which I have proposed. It would read this way:

SECTION 1. That no person, firm, joint-stock company, society, association, or corporation, their managers or officers, who are members of any exchange, society, corporation, or association in which or through which any contract or contracts for the future delivery of cotton are made shall send through the United States mail any letter, document, pamphlet, or other matter pertaining to the business of such person, company, association, or corporation, unless such exchange, society, corporation, or association shall require all such contracts for future delivery of cotton to specify the grade or grades contracted for in each and every contract.

And so forth.

If the Senator has a fear about the word "business" there when I say pertaining to the business of such corporation, the words "pertaining to said business" would cover the objection of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly; we do not want the word "person" used in that connection, because the business of the person might be an altogether different business from the business of the exchange. He might be engaged in some wholly independent business.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it says "no person" shall do this.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If it reads "that no person, firm, or company shall use the mails by sending any letter, document, pamphlet, or other matter relating to the business of the exchange, society, corporation, or association," then clearly it would refer to the cotton business, the business of the society or the exchange.

Mr. RANSDELL. That would be going entirely too far.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The business is wholly independent.

Mr. RANSDELL. There might be some entirely legitimate business of that exchange. The evil sought to be corrected here is dealing in futures unless they are safeguarded and regulated as provided by the bill. But there is other business of cotton exchanges besides future dealings, and very important business. If you are going to make it relate to every business of the exchange, you certainly destroy it entirely. If you adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and let it read "relating to such future contract or contracts," you get right to the marrow of the transaction; you reach the root of the evil that you are trying to eradicate, not relating to every other business of the exchange, because, as I said, much of it is entirely legitimate and proper and nobody wants to interfere with it.

Mr. REED. I wish to suggest language which, I think, would cover the point and avoid also covering more than the point desired to be embraced. If you use the language "relating to such contract" it might be that it would inhibit a letter protesting against the business of the exchange in relation to the contracts. Why not adopt this or similar language: After the word "matter" insert "in the promotion or furtherance of the making of such contracts"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The objection to that is that we want to except letters.

Mr. REED. Let it read "in the making or enforcement of such contracts."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would not be necessary. The contract might be made and we do not want the correspondence to continue afterwards about it.

Mr. REED. I suggest "in the promotion or furtherance of the making or enforcement of such contracts."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will leave out the word "making" and simply say "in furtherance of such contract," will he not accomplish what he wants?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the word "making" ought to be in, because that involves the original effort to make a contract.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps the Senator is right. Probably it is better to include both.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I think the Senator had the floor. I am occupying it by his courtesy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. REED. I am about through.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the purpose of the pending bill is to compel cotton exchanges selling future contracts to so regulate their contracts as to make the price list of these exchanges show the true value of lint cotton.

It is to prevent these cotton exchanges from selling a contract giving such undue advantage to the seller that those who sell upon the exchange may have it in their power to depress the prices at which cotton sells on the exchange.

The plan of the bill is to require all exchanges engaging in the sale of cotton for future delivery to so shape their contracts as to remove the present unfair means by which sellers of cotton on these exchanges depress the price of cotton and use the exchanges for gambling purposes.

The penalties provided by the bill are to exclude from the mails all the business of those connected with the exchange where this business has anything to do with the sale of cotton unless the contract provided in this bill is used by the exchange, and also to exclude from the mails and telegraph service all price lists made on cotton exchanges which do not use the contract required in this bill.

This bill is especially directed at the New York Cotton Exchange. For years the cotton planters of the South, the men who on the farms have raised the lint cotton, have protested that the market prices of cotton which their labor brought into commerce were trifled with and depressed by a set of gamblers who manipulated the price of cotton on the New York exchange in a manner that affected the price of lint cotton itself.

Recently the manufacturers of cotton have joined in the protest, and we have resolutions condemning the methods of the New York Cotton Exchange from cotton manufacturers of New England and from cotton manufacturers of the South. Other cotton exchanges throughout the country have also joined in protest against the methods of the New York Cotton Exchange. The New York Commercial day by day condemns them and points out the fact that the contracts sold by the New York Cotton Exchange cause an unfair fluctuation in prices on that exchange, misleading the public as to the true value of lint cotton. I have here also an editorial from the Newark News, one of the largest papers in the manufacturing section of New Jersey, where lint cotton is largely spun and woven, condemning the methods of the New York Cotton Exchange.

So I begin my case in support of this bill with protests from all the parties at interest against what is going on upon the New York Cotton Exchange.

The New York Cotton Exchange handles over 250,000,000 bales of cotton annually. Its records profess to show the sales daily of middling cotton and the prices at which this grade of cotton sells in New York City. Their sales profess to apply not only to immediate months, but monthly in the future to each month of the year. They profess to record the market price of middling cotton for immediate delivery and for future delivery during 11 months of the year.

New York City is the great metropolis of our country. It is the center of wealth and trade. The New York Cotton Exchange is by far the largest cotton exchange in the United States. Its sales far exceed those of any other cotton exchange and all other cotton exchanges. The records of its daily prices are sent by the press associations to each paper in the United States which handles reports from a press association. Its daily price lists have a circulation throughout the United States and throughout the world far in excess of all other price lists in the United States indicating the market price of cotton.

The public generally understand that cotton is really bought and sold on the New York exchange, and that a purchaser under their published prices can buy for immediate or future delivery middling cotton at the prices indicated by their price lists. It must, therefore, appear at once that the price lists which go out from the New York Cotton Exchange have an almost controlling influence on the market price of cotton.

It can be accepted as undoubtedly true that an unfair depression of the price upon the New York Cotton Exchange depresses also the price of lint cotton all over the South. Indeed, it is a fact that many large buyers of lint cotton instruct their local buyers to purchase by the price lists of the New York exchange, requiring them to bid the New York exchange price less about one-half a cent a pound.

So, if I show that a contract is used on the New York Cotton Exchange which enables sellers in that exchange to unfairly depress the price on that exchange of cotton for present and future delivery, I show that this exchange takes the hard earnings of the farmer away from him by preventing him from receiving a just price for his lint cotton.

If I show that their contract is one which enables them to put up and down their own prices almost as they see fit, I show that the manipulation of the market on this exchange is damaging to the manufacturer and the cotton merchant as well as the cotton grower.

Lint cotton is the second greatest agricultural product of the United States; corn comes first. The crop last year, including the seed, was worth $1,000,000,000. A large part of the crop is shipped abroad. Upon it our country depends to a great extent for its international trade balances. That portion of the crop which is manufactured in the United States furnishes occupation for a large number of citizens, and is one of our chief raw materials for manufacture. The importance, therefore, of the staple, both as it applies to our international trade balances and as it applies to the producer and the manufacturer, is apparent.

I charge that the New York Cotton Exchange handles its business under a system which is unfair and disreputable. The system permits the manipulation of prices for gambling purposes, and it is continuously used to raise or lower the market prices of lint cotton to meet the wishes of the manipulators. This is unjust to the producer of cotton and to the manufacturer and is an unfair stab at the interests of our entire country.

My charge is that, instead of being a legitimate exchange furnishing an opportunity for those who have cotton now or will have it in the future to trade with those who need it now or will need it in the future, the New York Cotton Exchange has devised a scheme by which the seller can so tender to a purchaser cotton that the purchaser can not take; or if he does take it, he receives something he did not buy, worth much less than the legitimate market price of the cotton which he was supposed to buy.

My charge is that the New York Cotton Exchange contract, with the rules and regulations surrounding it, creates a system of doing business which amounts to little less than gambling and enables the inside crowd to play with the outside crowd, the inside crowd holding and seeing all the cards, with every opportunity to fleece their outside customers.

I wish to point out some features of their contract and mode of business—at least, sufficient to justify my charge.

First: Number of grades. The New York Cotton Exchange uses under its system a large number of grades of cotton. While middling is the basic grade of all sales, they retain the right to the seller to deliver any one of the grades named in their list, and their list covers 22 grades of cotton besides middling. A purchaser may buy 100 bales of middling cotton. He may have use for 100 bales of middling cotton in his own mill, or he may have a customer who desires the cotton and will use it at his mill. When the purchaser, through the New York Cotton Exchange, receives the cotton, although he bought middling cotton, he may have delivered to him cotton so far below middling that it is entirely useless for the purpose intended. Not alone is this true, but he may be tendered a mixed lot of cotton, with only a few bales of each grade scattered over the entire list of 23 grades, requiring him, if he takes it, to hunt purchasers for each one of the various grades, none of which may be the grade he actually purchased.

Again, these various grades of cotton may be scattered all through the warehouse, not classified, so that the purchaser can go to the warehouse, and if he obtains what is tendered to him, he must have large quantities of cotton handled and hunt through lot after lot for his particular grades.

They have also a system of tendering the cotton which they call pro forma. It consists of tendering cotton through an invoice which does not specify the exact grade of the cotton, and which leaves the party tendering the cotton additional time to designate the exact grades of cotton to be actually delivered. The purchaser puts up his money and must wait to find out what he is to receive. When he finally receives a list of the grades, he then must go through the process I have just described of obtaining it, and if he finds that he can not handle the cotton outside of the New York Cotton Exchange on account of its bad character and undertakes to resell it through the exchange, although it has been examined and certified by the exchange to him, he must have it reclassified and certified and pay for this work. With all these hindrances thrown around him he naturally throws up his hands and says, "Keep your cotton and settle with me as you please."

Second. Arbitrary differences: The mode of delivery before described is bad enough, but far worse is the system pursued by the New York Cotton Exchange of fixing an arbitrary difference of value between the middling cotton which the purchaser undertook to buy and the 22 other grades, either one or many of which may be delivered to the purchaser. By this I mean that a purchaser may buy on the New York Cotton Exchange middling cotton, and that when he calls for his cotton the seller can deliver to him any 1 of the 13 grades of cotton less valuable than middling or any 1 of 9 grades of cotton more valuable than middling. If 1 of these 13 grades less valuable than middling, or if a mixed lot is tendered, the seller does not pay to the purchaser the actual difference in market value of the lower grades which he tenders and middling cotton. He is required by the rules of the New York Exchange simply to tender an arbitrary difference which the exchange itself has fixed and which it has been in the habit of fixing only once a year.

Good, ordinary cotton is a grade below middling. The difference in its value and the value of middling cotton varies every year, based upon the character of the crop, the amount of the good ordinary produced, and the demand for it. The market difference in value might be $8 a bale, and yet if the exchange fixed a difference at $3 a bale the purchaser of middling cotton would be forced to take good ordinary and receive only $3 a bale bonus for taking a cotton worth $8 a bale less than the cotton which he purchased. The purchaser would, therefore, be receiving in cotton and money $5 less a bale than the middling cotton which he bought was worth. This would be a cent a pound less than his middling cotton on the spot markets was worth. It will readily be seen that the inside sellers, realizing that they could settle for middling cotton under the system of the exchange at $5 less a bale than its market price, could bear on the market the sales of middling cotton down 1 cent a pound.

I will mention yet another element that furnishes opportunity under the New York Cotton Exchange system to manipulate and bear the market by freeing the seller from having to deliver a genuine quality of cotton. All middling cotton is not exactly the same cotton. All the lower grades of cotton below middling are not of exactly the same value. Cotton is graded largely according to color and cleanliness. Under the system used in the New York Cotton Exchange a large lot of cotton can be purchased, and then the best of the various grades can be picked out and sold to manufacturers, while the poorest are retained and kept in New York to be tendered to purchasers. There is a difference in the length of the staple of cotton of the same grade, and there is a difference in the character of the cotton of the same grade. A systematic effort to select cotton of short staple and poor character, though falling within the grades named, make it possible for those dealing upon the New York Cotton Exchange to retain a lot of junk, commonly called dog-tail cotton, and, supplied with this inferior quality of the grades to be tendered, furnish not only a low grade with an arbitrary difference between this and the grade sold, but also a poor class of the lower grade far below the average run of the grade. This means also has been resorted to on the New York Cotton Exchange, and low-character low-grade cotton has been accumulated from year to year to be tendered to purchasers as an additional means of depreciating the character of the tender made by the seller when the purchaser calls for his cotton, and in this way force down the price of cotton sold by the farmer.

As low as has been the standard of character of cotton used by the New York Exchange, I see by the papers of last Saturday that a big cotton house, the biggest perhaps in the United States, which is supposed to be heavily short on the New York Cotton Exchange, has been endeavoring to force the exchange to accept and certify a large amount of additional very low-character cotton heretofore rejected by the exchange. I do not believe the officers of the cotton exchange will dare to yield to this demand. If they do the law should be used to strike both the cotton house and the exchange. The difficulty, however, is that one small, ordinary dealer can not carry the burden. It requires an organization of manufacturers and cotton men to meet the situation.

I have certainly pointed out a sufficient number of lines of conduct pursued on the New York Exchange to show that the system is unfair, if not disreputable. Its unfair means of delivery gives sellers upon the exchange the opportunity to force down the prices bid for cotton on the exchange almost at their pleasure, for the sellers well know that buyers can not afford to take under their system what they offer. The immense quantity of their sales, with their facility for advertising their selling prices all over the country, tend to force actual prices down and thereby injure the men who raise lint cotton. The prices are made fictitiously to rise and fall, thereby injuring all who handle cotton, the manufacturer as well as the cotton grower.

The time has come when this institution as now conducted should be suppressed, unless it can be forced to adopt honest methods. It is no more entitled to the use of the mails and the telegraph lines under its business as now conducted than was the lottery, the exclusion of the business of which from the mails was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is the organized enemy of cotton growers and cotton manufacturers, manipulating prices of the raw materials which the one manufactures and which the other grows.

A few years ago, suffering from the effect of the evil conduct of this organized enemy, certain cotton buyers and cotton manufacturers united together and determined to buy and require delivered to them all the cotton held by the New York Exchange. They made an agreement that they would buy and distribute among themselves the cotton, agreeing further that neither of those in the compact would resell the cotton so that it could be used in the gambling marts of the New York Exchange. The organization was made in self-defense against a wicked enemy, which by unfair means was attacking and breaking down their legitimate business. This organization should have been commended by honest men who believe in a square deal, and yet under the direction of the Department of Justice these men engaged in a patriotic work were charged with being guilty of an illegal conspiracy and were indicted for alleged violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

To-day if a body of men, manufacturers and cotton merchants, would join together under a similar agreement and take up all the junk called cotton now on the New York Exchange, agreeing not to resell any of it through any exchange, and thereby arrest the work of the men who have been manipulating cotton for the past few months to the injury of the public, they should be commended for their service more than an organization of private citizens who would invade a den of gamblers.

I would be glad to see the exchanges continue in legitimate business. I would be glad to see them continue operation with their unfair system eliminated. But, if this can not be done, then better destroy them than to allow a continuation of their present conduct. If they can be forced to give up their unfair methods, which I have criticized and others which are well known, if they can be made to deliver cotton covered by Government standardization and deliver it promptly, with no strings tied to the mode of delivery to deprive the purchaser of his just rights, then with their gambling methods brought to an end they would be of real value.

We will try them now with an effort to regulate, but they should understand that forbearance has about ceased. There is a way to stop them entirely, and unless they help purify their own house and bring it to a condition of decent and legitimate business, the next movement against them will be to terminate them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to make a statement and then to ask the Senator from Georgia some questions touching his amendment.

I am very heartily in sympathy with the purpose of this legislation. The amendment in the nature of a substitute the Senator from South Carolina has proposed to Senate bill 110 prohibits the use of the mail to every person, joint stock company, association, or corporation affiliated with a cotton exchange through which are made contracts for the future delivery of cotton, unless the exchange requires the contracts for future delivery to specify, first, the grade contracted for, and, second, that such grades as are contracted for shall be according to the United States Government standardization. There is no express requirement in the proposed substitute that the cotton when delivered shall be of the grade specified in the contract.

The amendment of the Senator from Georgia, as I understand—and I have considered it somewhat carefully—denies the use of the mails to members of a cotton exchange unless quite a number of conditions are complied with in addition to those which are set forth in the substitute of the Senator from South Carolina. The first condition in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is that the contract used by the exchange must be in writing. Of course, the purpose of that is manifest. To state the proposition is to argue it. The difficulty of proving what the contract actually is unless it is in writing suggests itself to the mind of any person.

The second requirement in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia is that the parties to the contract must be specified in the contract, and the third is that the contract must be signed. The fourth requirement is that the contract must disclose the number of bales bought or sold. Fifth, it must set out the price per pound of basis middling cotton, called the "basis grade." Sixth, the contract must state the date of purchase or sale and the month in which the sale is to be fulfilled or settled. Seventh, the contract must provide that delivery may be made or settlement effected within the grade limits established by the Government standardization of cotton. Eighth, the contract must provide that where cotton other than the "basis grade" is delivered the differences above or below the contract price which the receiver of the cotton shall pay must be determined according to the commercial value of the cotton on the sixth day before the settlement of the contract.

This commercial value is to be determined in one of two ways—first, either by the "spot" market where the transaction takes place and is consummated, or, second, if there be no "spot" market, then the differences in value are to be determined, according to the terms of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, from the differences in value in the "spot" markets at five different places designated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

My immediate purpose is to inquire of the Senator from Georgia concerning some of the features of his proposed substitute and what appear to me to be at least slight ambiguities in the language of the proposed substitute, and I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a few questions as to the verbiage of his amendment.

The first question is, What is the exact meaning of the language "where the future transaction involved takes place and is consummated"? Does that mean the market in the place where the contract is made or the market in the place where the cotton is to be delivered? The subject presents, of course, no great difficulty; but it seems to me that there might be an ambiguity there. If a manufacturer of cotton goods, for instance, buys 100 bales "basis-middling" cotton through the New Orleans Exchange, to be delivered six months thereafter at a mill, say, for instance, at Monticello, Ark., and the seller delivers some other grade than "basis middling," which market would be consulted in considering and determining the differences in value—the New Orleans market or the Monticello market? I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia that question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think the provision itself contemplated the place where the exchange was itself located, if the transaction was really closed at that place. What was in view was this, that unless New York became a "spot" market, according to the plan of this bill, which forced them to really have genuine cotton and deliver it, then that five places should be named by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am coming to that in just a moment. I want to ask the Senator about that; but what I want to know is, if the market at the place where the contract requires the cotton shall be delivered differs from the market where the contract is actually made, which will govern? Take, for instance, the illustration which I have already offered: If the New Orleans market differs from the Monticello market, which would govern in fixing the difference? In other words, what is the meaning of the language used, "where the future transaction involved takes place and is consummated"? Does it mean the city where the exchange is located or the place of delivery of the cotton?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was intended to mean the situs of the exchange.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator not think he might just as well say that and save what otherwise might be an ambiguity?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would not object to that at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely suggest that to the Senator from Georgia, and if he thinks it of enough importance, he will so modify his amendment.

Suppose there is no bona fide "spot" market in the place where the "future" transaction takes place and is consummated, as defined by the Senator from Georgia; that is, suppose there is no bona fide spot market in the place where the exchange is located, I take it for granted that it would seldom occur that the second provision for determining the differences in value would be invoked; but, if it should be invoked, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia, if there was a difference in the market value of the cotton at these five places designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, how would the difference in value be determined where cotton, other than the basis grade, is actually delivered?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not exactly understand the Senator's question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, the Senator provides in his amendment that the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate five markets, and that if there is no market where the contract is made, then resort must be had to these five markets. Suppose the five markets are different; that the market in New Orleans differs from the market in Memphis, and the market in Memphis differs from the market in New York.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The average would govern.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the amendment of the Senator from Georgia does not say so; and I wanted to call that to the attention of the Senator from Georgia. There is an ambiguity there, and one that I think is of considerable importance. The language of the proposed amendment is that——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was under the impression that the amendment used the word "average."

Mr. ROBINSON. But it does not use that word. I thought, perhaps, that was the intention of the Senator from Georgia, but the language of the Senator's amendment is:

> The said differences in value in the spot markets at five places designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, as the said differences were established by the sales of spot cotton of the same grade, respectively, in such five markets upon the sixth business day prior to the settlement of the contract.

There is no way in that amendment provided for determining these differences in value where other than the basis grade is delivered, if it happens to be true, as frequently is the case, that the market differs at these various five places.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is the second copy; it has been written several times. When I first dictated it the word "average" was used.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the intention, then?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The word "average" has been lost in recopying. The word "average" was contained in the proposed amendment when it was first written.

Mr. ROBINSON. I assume that the Senator from Georgia, before submitting his amendment finally, will modify it so as to take care of that proposition.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia one or two other questions touching the language of his amendment. What is the object of the provision:

> But actual delivery of classified cotton shall be made on the first of the month at the same time that the buyer pays his money.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not intend to press that; I shall strike that from the copy in making the formal offer of the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was just about to ask the Senator why those words were used.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I will not offer it, it is not necessary to discuss it.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not necessary to argue it; but I did not know what the purpose of the Senator from Georgia was. I had not been advised of his intention to eliminate that provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was to eliminate the opportunity of running through 30 days and to have 1 day fixed to conclude the transaction.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Georgia been printed?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was just about to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that, if that provision stood in his amendment and his amendment should be adopted, it would prevent the seller of cotton from extending credit to the purchaser, even if he desired to do so; at least it would require the contract to specify that at the time of delivery the purchaser must pay for it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He is required now, under the contract, to pay as soon as the pro forma is tendered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but in this bill we are doing away with the practice of pro forma tender. I take it that it is not the purpose of the Senator from Georgia to require a manufacturer to buy his product for future delivery and pay for the cotton at the time of delivery if the seller of the cotton is willing to extend him the credit that he wants.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON. I can not see any reason why that should be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator is right about that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, another question. Referring to lines 19 and 20 on page 3 of the Senator's amendment, does this language contemplate that it will be unlawful to make contracts for the future delivery of cotton less in amount than 100 bales?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. What it does is this: It requires that 100 of the bales shall run of the same standard.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If you buy 500 bales or a thousand bales of cotton, each lot shall comprise 100 bales of the same class. If you buy 200 bales, they are not allowed to give you 22 different kinds of cotton on your 200-bale purchase. That is all it means.

Mr. ROBINSON. I apprehended that might be the purpose of the amendment, but I want again to call attention—and I ask the pardon of the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to call his attention to the fact that the language of the amendment as it is submitted here would require that all sales of cotton for future delivery should be by units of 100 bales or multiples of 100 bales and that there could be no sales for future delivery of less than 100 bales of cotton.

The language is this:

> That such contract must further provide for even-running lots of units of 100 bales of the same grade.

Unless the Senator modifies that language so that it may clearly express the meaning which he states he has in mind, it could not be susceptible of any other construction than that where a contract is made by a cotton exchange there must be at least 100 bales provided for in the sale or purchase and multiples of 100 bales.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The New York Cotton Exchange only sells in lots of 100 bales and multiples of 100 bales. I had the business of that exchange in mind.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the Senator does not want to prevent a manufacturer from buying for future delivery 20 bales that include all those grades if he wants them and needs them. I thought at first perhaps the purpose of this provision was absolutely to shut out the little fellow from future transactions in cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. To set such a limit on it that the small man could not speculate in futures. If, however, hereafter these are to be bona fide transactions, if pro forma tenders of cotton are to be abolished and bona fide tenders are to be required under these contracts, then I can see no reason for preventing a man from buying any amount that he wants. Therefore I respectfully submit it is unwise to limit him to buying 100 bales in the language of your amendment, whatever your purpose may be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The purpose is just exactly what it says. On the New York Exchange there are no sales except in 100-bale lots.

Mr. ROBINSON. You do not say in this amendment anything about the New York Exchange.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that, but what other exchanges sell in less lots? What exchange engaged in selling futures sells in less than 100-bale lots? New Orleans does not, does it?

Mr. THORNTON. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator uses this language in lines 19 and 20:

> That such contract must further provide for even running lots of units of 100 bales of the same grade.

In other words, suppose the purchaser did not want to buy over 100 bales, and he wanted 20 bales of each one of the five grades. Under the plain, unambiguous language of this amendment he could not do it whatever your purpose may have been.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. His purchase is of middling cotton.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The purchases on these exchanges are all made of middling cotton, and this limitation prevents the tender of less than 100 bales of a particular grade other than his basis purchase.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. Now, suppose the contract is for less than 100 bales of any kind of grade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not suppose that, because I do not know any exchange engaged in future business that allows it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The difficulty arises here, Mr. President; the unit of a contract is 100 bales, or 50,000 pounds.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now anyone can buy just 100 bales. As the Senator from Arkansas says, it might be that a buyer would desire a mixed lot. He might desire some of each of the grades we produce. Under the terms of that language he could not buy 100 bales. He would have to buy a contract comprising more than 100 bales, which would be 200, the next above it, in order to get his mixed lot in the second hundred, because the amendment provides that the contract shall be for at least 100 bales of even-running lots. I think the idea of the Senator from Georgia may be expressed by saying that the contract shall provide for even-running lots. That is an expression known in all trades, "even-running lots"; not that they shall be all of one grade, but that they shall be even-running. That is an expression understood by all cotton men to mean that the principal grade shall be the general average.

Now, for instance, a man will say: "I want 100 bales average middling." There may be some above; there would have to be some above and some below, but the average in the even-running lot is middling. That is what the trade is asking; and if the Senator will allow me, I will read here a letter from a manufacturer on exactly the point raised by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I think the trouble with the Senator from Arkansas is that he is confusing the specific contract by which a manufacturer, for instance, contracts for the future delivery of actual cotton that he needs in his business and the ordinary future contracts on the exchange which is used as a hedge.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I am not confusing them, Mr. President. The purpose of this bill, as stated by the Senator from Georgia, and as it appears from its express language, is to abolish the iniquitous practice of pro forma tenders of cotton, and to require actual delivery of cotton in every case where a contract is made upon an exchange. If that is the case, I think the language in lines 19 and 20, on page 3, ought to be modified; but I am satisfied that the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from South Carolina can agree upon the modification necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not at all wedded to lines 19 and 20.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, I should like to read just one paragraph from a letter from one of the cotton mills in my State:

> The New York Cotton Exchange has introduced, as you know, a resolution, to be effective April 1, 1915, to adopt Government standards. But this resolution is so carefully worded that you can readily see there is no mention made forcing a delivery of average grade of middling. The whole keynote of the situation hinges on this particular point. Even though you adopt the nine Government grades, and a manufacturer decides to buy a contract of cotton for hedging purposes and accepts the delivery, if the delivery was made of all of strict good ordinary the cotton would be worthless, for there are so few mills equipped to work all low-grade cotton. They must have an average mix. A farmer never makes a crop of cotton below an average grade of middling, and the manufacturer can hardly work cotton below an average grade of middling except for very coarse yarns. Therefore, please be sure that you lay stress upon this particular point and see that the contracts always read for a delivery of 100 bales to have an average grade of middling.

Mr. ROBINSON. With this explanation, I leave that matter for the further consideration of the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Georgia. With the further indulgence of the Senator from Georgia, I wish to ask him one other question, and then I will conclude with a brief statement about this bill.

What is the purpose and what does the Senator from Georgia think will be the legal effect of section 5? The language is:

> It is hereby declared to be legal for any number of men or corporations to agree to purchase lint cotton and to further stipulate that the same is not to be sold by or through a cotton exchange which is engaged in selling futures.

What is the purpose of that provision, and what will be its effect?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The purpose and effect are both very simple. If a number of manufacturers and cotton merchants desired to buy cotton on the New York Exchange, and agreed to purchase a certain lot, and agreed also that they would not sell it again through an exchange engaged in selling futures, they could do so legally.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is, that they would not retender it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That they would not retender it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish now to conclude with a very brief statement.

The purpose of this legislation, in my judgment, is very wholesome. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is perhaps as familiar with this subject as any Member of this body, having had, as I am informed, a great deal of practical experience in handling cotton. This bill is intended to invoke the power of the Government to control the use of the mails to prevent the continuance of a practice which has met with universal disapproval upon the part of those who are engaged in a legitimate cotton business, whether as manufacturers or producers of cotton.

I have thought, Mr. President, that it would be well that the contract should specify that the cotton when delivered should be of the grade specified in the contract, on the theory that when we require the fulfillment of contracts it is well to compel their performance as made; but the amendment of the Senator from Georgia protects, or at least is designed to protect, the producer, the seller, and the cotton buyer as well against the evils of a practice which has been universally condemned. If the differences in value shall be determined according to the actual market standards, I know of no reason why the seller should not be permitted to deliver any one within the nine grades fixed by the Government standardization; but if he should be permitted to deliver according to the "fixed differences," which rarely are synonymous with the "market differences," the evils would not be abated, but would be legalized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to address a question to the Senator from South Carolina. I notice that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has offered an amendment, which, I take it, is pending, in line 6, page 1, after the word "cotton," to insert "on the open future-contract market in any cotton exchange or similar institution." Has the committee considered that amendment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It appears to me that unless some such amendment as that is inserted somewhere upon the bill you are running the risk of interfering with some perfectly legitimate transactions.

You do not want to interfere by this bill with a case like this: A man comes to me and says, "What will you sell me your crop for, to be delivered in December?" I have known of transactions of that sort. "I am willing to pay 10 cents on a basis of middling cotton. Are you willing to take that now?" "Yes; I am willing to take it. There is a profit in it to me. I will give up any hope of profit above that, provided I am secured against a loss below it."

What is there in this bill that does not make that man amenable to the penalties of the bill if he uses the mail or the telegraph in effecting such an arrangement?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. An amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the effect that anyone can sell basis middling and deliver any one of the nine Government grades in settlement thereof, according to the commercial difference of the grades. That is an amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why should this bill extend beyond the exchanges? Why should it affect individuals in the legitimate business of selling cotton to one another for the purpose of actual delivery in the future? Why should you go into that, any more than into a contract where some one undertakes to deliver to the Senator from Indiana, next January, 100 mule colts 1 year of age?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is limited to associations. It does not apply to individuals.

Mr. WILLIAMS. According to its language it does. If it does not, then I have misread it. It says "that any person, partnership, joint-stock company"——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Go on, though—"who are members of any exchange, society, corporation," and so forth. The person must be a member of the exchange.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where does the language "who are members" occur?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the third and fourth lines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of what page?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The first page.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I have the wrong bill, I reckon. This one reads:

That any person, partnership, joint-stock company, society, association, or corporation, their managers or officers, engaged in interstate commerce.

I see I have the wrong bill, and not the Senator's amendment, which was adopted.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to say something about this bill in behalf of the cotton growers of my section of the country and the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. There has been a great deal said here about the evils of exchanges, and I assume that, in speaking about the horrible conditions of these cotton exchanges, Senators must have had in mind the New York Cotton Exchange; for if the New Orleans Cotton Exchange has been doing anything very wicked in recent years in its cotton-future transactions I have not heard of it.

Some years ago the New Orleans Cotton Exchange adopted the Government grades or standards of cotton; and it also adopted—in fact it had used it for a long time—the system of commercial differences in the value of the cotton tendered in settlement of these contracts. The great trouble in New York seems to have been that the Government standards or grades were not adopted, but arbitrary grades, which the New York Cotton Exchange said should be the grades, were acted upon; and when settlements were made between the cotton actually tendered and the middling which was the basis grade, instead of settling by the commercial differences in the spot-cotton market the settlement was made upon fixed differences between the value of the cotton tendered and the value of the basis grade. Undoubtedly very great wrongs resulted from that system, wrongs which, in my judgment, sir, it is the duty of Congress to correct. I sincerely hope Congress is going to correct those evils. I shall lend my voice and my vote to correct them. But, sir, I contend that if we have a proper future contract for the great commodity known as cotton, a contract properly regulated and properly controlled, it will be beneficial to the people of this country, very beneficial to the cotton grower, beneficial to the manufacturer, and beneficial to the American Nation, because cotton is one of our greatest products.

The system of dealing in cotton futures grew up about 30 years ago. Under this system the tremendously valuable cotton crop has been handled for 30 years. It would not do, sir, to break and destroy arbitrarily the system under which this very valuable crop has been handled for a third of a century, a system so well known through all the commercial world, and a system which, in my judgment, in spite of many evils, has caused the cotton grower of the South to receive more money and more steady prices than he received before this system came into vogue. By the correction of these evils, without completely destroying the exchanges, a much greater benefit will result to the cotton grower.

Let me call your attention to one pertinent fact in this connection. Prior to the adoption of the system of dealing in futures the variation in prices was as follows:

The average yearly range of prices at New Orleans for middling cotton during the 30 years prior to the Civil War, when there was no future business, and during the 30 years when the future business was transacted in both New Orleans and New York was as follows:

From 1831–32 to 1860–61, both inclusive, there was an average variation of 4.12 cents per pound. From 1878–79 to 1907–8, both inclusive, the average variation was 2.93 cents per pound. The excess of average yearly fluctuations during the 30 years of the nonfuture period over the 30 years of the future period was 1.18 cents per pound, or its equivalent to $5.92 on a 500-pound—gross weight—bale.

The future business as now conducted commenced in New Orleans in 1878–79—January 20, 1880—but I have taken in the year prior to fill out the 30-year period.

The widest yearly range of fluctuations in the 30-year period from 1831–32 to 1860–61 was 8 cents per pound in the commercial year 1833–34, equivalent to $40 per 500-pound, gross weight, bale, and the widest range in the 30-year period from 1878–79 to 1907–8 was 7⅝ cents per pound, equivalent to $36.56 per 500-pound bale. In 2 of the ante bellum years the fluctuation was 8 cents; in 4 of the years, 7 cents and over; in 1 of the years, 6 cents; in 7 of the years, 4 cents and over; in 6 of the years, 3 cents and over. In but 10 of the 30 ante bellum years were the fluctuations under 3 cents per year.

During the 30-year future period the fluctuations were 7 cents and over in 1 year; 6 cents in 1 year; 4 cents and over in 5 years; 3 cents and over in 4 years.

In 19 of the 30 years of the futures period the annual range of fluctuations was under 3 cents, and of these 9 were 2 cents and under.

These facts show beyond question that there was a great regularity of prices during the 30 years since we have been dealing in futures than during the 30 years preceding the Civil War, when there were no cotton-future transactions.

Mr. President, I have no objection in the world to the bill as it is to be amended, I hope, by the amendments offered by the Senator from Georgia; but the bill as presented by the Senator from South Carolina, if written into law, would be fatal to the cotton industry. That bill provides for a contract for the specific delivery of a certain grade of cotton. It is a specific contract rather than a basis contract. The making of specific contracts is engaged in at the present time by the people who need specific cotton for their business. The manufacturer needs a thousand bales of a certain grade, a certain color, a certain length, a certain fineness of staple. He goes into the market where there are men dealing in actual spot cotton. He enters into a specific contract with a merchant to deliver him a thousand bales of cotton filling all the requirements that he needs. That is what we call a specific contract.

Now, how is that merchant enabled to enter into that specific contract? He has not the cotton in his warehouse. He knows that it will be necessary for him to buy that thousand bales of cotton in order that he may supply it to his customer. So the very moment that he makes a specific contract for 1,000 bales of a certain grade of cotton he goes into the future market and makes a future contract—the basis contract—for 1,000 bales, which operates as a hedge and protects him against any loss in delivering the actual kind of cotton that he proposed to deliver. That kind of a contract is a decided advantage to the grower, and why? It makes a greater number of purchasers, particularly during the season when there would be the greatest pressure on the spot markets, unless these forward sales had been made, because of the movement of cotton from the farms to market during October, November, and December. Suppose we pass a law prohibiting any dealing in cotton futures, you will then limit the buyers to the men who need the cotton for immediate use. There will be nobody else to buy. It will only be the people who actually need the cotton in their business who will buy.

Now, do we limit transactions in real estate to people who need the real estate in their business? Do we limit transactions in any of the ordinary occupations and businesses of life to the people who need the things in which they deal? Not at all. We allow what is called legitimate business speculation. We permit speculation in any kind of business. It is done every day; it is done all the time; and this future business is simply a medium of speculating in cotton.

Ah, but you tell me that speculation is wrong. I say to you that speculation when conducted legitimately is no more wrong than insurance, and, like insurance, eliminates gambling.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not all speculation upon either the grain or cotton exchanges merely another name for gambling rather than any legitimate speculation?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not think so at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does it not develop, and does it not appeal simply to the gambling instinct?

Mr. RANSDELL. No; it is no more gambling than it is for me to go out here and buy a lot on Sixteenth Street in this city, hoping that it is going to go up in value. I have a good home; I do not want to live on that lot; I do not propose to build a house on it; but I believe it is going up in value, and I believe there is a chance for me to make money on it. It is no more gambling than it is for me to insure my house for $7,000 against loss by fire. When I do that I bet $100 that my house is going to burn. The insurance company bets me $7,000 that my house will not burn. Would anybody say that that is gambling? It used to be called gambling in the early days of insurance, but people have learned more sense now. They say that business——

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not this the difference? In the contracts for the future delivery of cotton you do not expect any cotton. You are not really buying cotton at all. You are buying an option, and you are settling the difference between what you guessed the price would be and what it actually is, without any idea whatever of ever taking or receiving the identical thing. Is there not a clear distinction between that and a case where the manufacturer wants the cotton for his own purposes?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the Senator's statement in my judgment is entirely incorrect. The cotton-future transaction, as I stated before, is a hedge; it is a legitimate form of insurance. Let me state the proposition again. The cotton manufacturer needs a thousand bales of spot cotton to convert into cloth. He needs it of specific lengths, specific whiteness, and specific qualities generally. He goes to a merchant and says to him, "I want a thousand bales." The merchant says, "All right, Mr. Brown, I will be glad to sell you a thousand bales; I enter your order for it." If there were no future market, that merchant would have to book the order and buy that cotton as it came into market. He could not tell what it was going to be worth. He could not deal with any certainty in it. But under the present circumstances when the seller of that cotton is enabled to hedge he makes his specific price to the manufacturer, and having specified to the manufacturer that he will sell him that thousand bales specifically at 10 cents a pound, the cotton to be actually delivered and cotton which will be delivered, bona fide as any contract can possibly be, that merchant goes into the future market and buys a thousand bales of middling cotton, pays his 10 cents, to act as an insurance, to act as a hedge to enable him to deliver that cotton at 10 cents a pound, or the difference, as the case may be. He sells in one instance the actual cotton for 10 cents a pound, and buys in the other instance, on the future market, the thousand bales of cotton at 10 cents a pound to insure him, and when the insurance is settled, when the transaction is closed, the manufacturer gets his thousand bales of spot cotton and the other transaction is wiped off the books. Can any one say it is not a legitimate piece of business, just as legitimate as any other insurance can be? Beyond question it is.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not question at all the legitimacy of the hedging contract that is made by a person who is actually buying cotton for future delivery; but I ask the Senator candidly upon that proposition, Is it not a fact that where there is one dollar's worth of cotton purchase for the purpose of hedging there are a thousand dollars' worth of it bought and sold without any idea of ever using one pound of that cotton, but merely to settle the differences according as the contract price may go up or down? That, I know, is the case in dealing in wheat, and I want to ask the Senator if it is not also true with reference to cotton.

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not speak from personal information, although I am a cotton raiser. I have no doubt that there are a good many people who gamble in cotton just as they do with cards, and just as they do with race horses, and just as they do with real estate, and just as they do with wheat, and just as they do in every other transaction. There are undoubtedly some things done in the cotton-futures business which ought not to be done; but my contention is that the main purpose of the business is a proper one, a just one, and we must not destroy the patient when we are trying to cure the disease. You would make your remedy so severe as to kill the patient. I would not like to have that kind of a doctor treating me. I say to the Senator and to all who are here that there have been evils in this business, and these evils must be corrected, and if the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] adopts my amendment or adopts the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia these evils will be corrected.

What are the principal things which we are seeking to correct? First, the arbitrary grades fixed by the New York Exchange; second, the settling by fixed differences instead of commercial differences.

Mr. President and Senators, what harm can there be in making a contract for the future delivery of a commodity?

Some say when you name one grade and allow them to deliver any one of nine you are not delivering the commodity you contract for. I say you are. Let me read you the contract of the New Orleans Exchange:

"In consideration of $1 in hand paid, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, we have this day sold to (or bought from) John Smith 50,000 pounds in about 100 square bales of cotton, growth of the United States, deliverable from press or presses, railroad depot or depots, in the port of New Orleans, between the first and last days of November next, inclusive.

"The delivery within such time to be at seller's option, in not more than two places, upon five days' notice to the buyer."

Now listen to this clause:

"The cotton to be of any grade from good ordinary to fair, inclusive, and if stained, not below middling; and if tinged, not below low middling, at the price of 10 cents (50) per pound for middling, with additions or deductions for other grades, according to the quotations of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange existing on the sixth (6th) day previous to the day on which delivery is due."

That shows that we are contracting for any one of those grades. We are not contracting for middling. Middling is the basis, but it is specifically stated in the contract that you can deliver any one of those grades and settle by the commercial difference existing in the price of spot cotton in New Orleans on the sixth day prior to the settlement.

"It is distinctly understood and agreed that the receiver of cotton under this contract shall have the right to refuse all bales that contain perished staple and all sandy, dusty, red, or gin-cut cotton, dusty cotton being defined under this contract as cotton lessened in value more than one-eighth cent per pound by reason of dust; sandy cotton being defined under this contract as cotton containing more than 1 per cent of sand.

"Either party shall have the right to call for a margin as the variations of the market for like deliveries may warrant, and which margin shall be kept good.

"This contract is made in view of and in all respects subject to the rules and conditions established by the New Orleans Cotton Exchange and in full accordance with rule 55 of said New Orleans Cotton Exchange.

"For the purposes of this contract, Westwego and Southport are not included as places of delivery.

"TOM JONES & Co."

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 27, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 26, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We would approach Thee, our Father in heaven, with open hearts, praying for more light to guide, more strength to sustain, more courage to do the right as it appears to us moment by moment, that we may harmonize our acts with all that is purest, noblest, best in us, leaving the results to Thee, who doeth all things well.

Out of the twilight of the past,
We move to a diviner light;
For nothing that is wrong can last,
Nothing's immortal but the right.

For Thou art God. Thy will be done. Amen.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
F. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the rule requires the reading of the statement after the report has been read. The statement has been printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will omit the reading of the statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill as agreed upon by the conferees carries $10,592,323.54. As it passed the House it carried $9,754,068.59. The Senate added to the bill $1,096,753.39. In conference the Senate receded from appropriations amounting to $258,498.44. The net amount added to the House bill is $838,254.95. Of that sum, however, $500,000 is to reimburse appropriations made for the various services of the Army in connection with the care of Mexican soldiers and military refugees in Texas.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman in regard to amendment No. 39, the appropriation of $7,500 proposed by the Senate to be paid to John Peppers, father of Irvin S. Pepper, late a Member of this House, which amendment was stricken out in conference. I should like to state that when this matter came up in the House this amendment went out on a point of order. The Member who made the point of order against it claimed to do so partly on information that he derived from somebody in this House, whose name was not given, who made the statement that Mr. Peppers was a man in very easy circumstances and had no need of this money. I am personally convinced from letters which I know to be trustworthy that this is not the fact. I may be slightly prejudiced and biased in this matter, because the late Mr. Pepper was my friend, my chum and intimate associate. I miss his counsel and comradeship at every day of my service here. He passed out during his term of public service, which was full of credit and honor. He had not accumulated riches, nor had his fine old father, who is now bowed with sorrow and enfeebled in health. There are instances of appropriations being made to nephews and nieces of Members of Congress, some of these beneficiaries being in very easy circumstances.

I am not trying to defend the custom of making these appropriations; but they have been granted to widows the beneficiaries of estates running into the millions. I believe that this is a thoroughly meritorious case, and I should like to see some way by which the appropriation can be made to Mr. Pepper's father.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, upon the information before the Committee on Appropriations when the urgent deficiency bill was under consideration, the committee deemed it inexpedient to include this item in the bill. When the bill was before the House an amendment for that purpose was offered, and was excluded by the interposition of a point of order. The Senate amended the bill by inserting the provision. The managers on the part of the House did not believe that the Senate was justified in attempting, by an amendment to the bill, to incorporate in it a matter peculiarly affecting the House, unless there was some indication from the House that it should be done.

Since the bill was under consideration in the Committee on Appropriations, however, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONNOLLY] and other Members of the Iowa delegation have obtained information additional to what was before the committee when the bill was under consideration. The action on this item in this bill does not foreclose the matter. There will be a general deficiency bill before the end of this session, and when that is under consideration an opportunity will be afforded to present the information that has been obtained by these gentlemen respecting the situation of Mr. Peppers, so that the House may have an opportunity to pass upon the question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman has finished his statement about that item, I desire to ask him about two other items in the bill; one, amendment 52, which relates to the Panama Canal opening, and the other, amendment 21, which carries $500,000 for the internment of Mexican soldiers and military refugees. I should like to ask the gentleman about those two items, which are agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Amendment 21, relative to the Mexican refugees, relates to this situation: We have in our custody some 6,000 men, women, and children who have come from Mexico into Texas. Under a provision of The Hague convention, if I recall correctly, the United States assumes the care of these persons. We can not surrender them to the Mexican Government and we can not turn them loose. Under the convention we are required to feed and maintain them. At the present rate it will take at least $500,000 up until the 30th of June. If there are additions to the number of persons coming into our custody, an additional amount will be required.

Mr. BUTLER. We may have half the population of Mexico over here yet.

Mr. MANN. Here are 6,000 of these Mexicans, and if it takes $500,000 to feed them for three months, that is at the rate of $2,000,000 a year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; we have had them for some time.

Mr. BUTLER. No; they came over last January.

Mr. MANN. For how long a time does this take care of them?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry to see this filibustering going on. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ten members present; not a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Davis	Korbly	Roberts, Nev.
Aiken	Donovan	L'Engle	Rucker
Ainey	Eagan	Lever	Rupley
Ashbrook	Edmonds	Loft	Shackleford

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-seven Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has consumed 10 minutes of his hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, when interrupted by the point of no quorum I had concluded my explanation of the first item about which the gentleman from Illinois had interrogated me.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman another question about that item. For how long a time is the half million dollars to provide for these Mexican citizens?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the balance of the fiscal year—until June 30, 1914.

Mr. MANN. I stated a while ago that that would be at the rate of $2,000,000 a year. The gentleman from New York said it covered more than between now and the 30th of June. How much of the $500,000 has been expended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Up to the present time, my recollection is, about $240,000.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we get 50,000 Mexican citizens into the United States; how long are we to take care of them out of the General Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. As long as we are required to do it by international obligations. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, and I am unable to answer the question. The only question involved, as far as the managers on the part of the House were concerned, is the necessity at the present time for this money, and we did not attempt to speculate in regard to the future.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that if there is any international policy to which we are obliged to conform, we ought to have some idea of what it is going to cost us.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nobody can tell. It depends entirely upon the number of Mexican soldiers, military refugees, that we may have in our custody and how long we shall be required to keep them in custody. I know of no one that is in possession of knowledge sufficient to give any accurate or definite information.

Mr. MANN. I would like to know what the international obligation is which requires us, if we should have 100,000 Mexican citizens on our soil, which is not unlikely, to spend fifteen or sixteen million dollars to take care of them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not impossible that we might have the whole Mexican citizenship, but I hope not.

Mr. MANN. There is no certainty that we will not, but I want to know what the international obligation is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia 10 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, under the agreement and convention agreed to by the United States when it adopted the articles of The Hague conference, the law of nations, and the laws of humanity, it is the duty of the United States to take care of and provide for, to disarm and intern and sustain the military refuges of a foreign government or people who are at war and come into our borders from Mexico, so long as we remain neutral. The United States, like any other neutral country, could have refused to permit these representatives of the army, the attendants, such as cooks and women who are in the camp for that purpose, and all those who are recognized by the War Department as military refugees to enter the territory and permit them to be arrested or imprisoned by the insurgents.

But the United States Government and those representing it did not see proper to do that. The laws of humanity would not have justified the United States Army or the President or the Government of the United States in turning these fleeing soldiers, and the women and children accompanying them, who fled from this battle, on or about January 31, across our borders, pursued by insurgents or constitutionalists or whatever you may call that band of warriors, or whatever they may be. We could have stopped them at our own border and refused to permit them to enter, in accordance with the laws of neutrality, but the laws of nations and the laws of humanity would not and ought not to consent to that. Then when they reached our neutral territory it became our duty under The Hague conference to do this. I desire now to read what our obligations are under that convention:

ARTICLE 11.

A neutral power which receives on its territory troops belonging to the belligerent armies shall intern them, as far as possible, at a distance from the theater of war.

It may keep them in camps and even confine them in fortresses or in places set apart for this purpose.

It shall decide whether officers can be left at liberty on giving their parole not to leave the neutral territory without permission.

ARTICLE 12.

In the absence of a special convention to the contrary, the neutral power shall supply the interned with the food, clothing, and relief required by humanity.

At the conclusion of peace the expense caused by the internment shall be made good.

ARTICLE 13.

A neutral power which receives escaped prisoners of war shall leave them at liberty. If it allows them to remain in its territory, it may assign them a place of residence.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. In one moment. Before I yield permit me to say that I have read from those articles of The Hague conference which have been ratified and accepted by the United States, by ratification in the Senate, since 1910. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia if there is no limitation to the number of people we are obliged under the treaty to provide for?

Mr. BARTLETT. The limitation is to the officers and men and those who are designated as military refugees. It does not mean any citizen of Mexico or any constitutionalist, so called. It means those who are engaged in battle or in war, the members of the army of either party. If they enter upon the neutral territory of the United States it becomes our duty, when we permit them to do so, not to enable them to return to the Government to which they belong, because that would be violating the laws of neutrality; that would be aiding the Government whose soldiers were on our territory; but we are compelled to do one of two things. We must refuse absolutely to permit them to enter our territory—by force, if necessary—or, if we permit them to enter our territory, we must comply with our treaty obligations and the laws of humanity and take care of them by supplying them with the necessary food and shelter; and in order that they may not return to their Government again and engage in war with the other Government it becomes our duty to secure their presence until the war is over, or until we can secure some means of consent by which they will be returned, and not be again used in warfare.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That applies also to women and children.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is any expense we incur on that account reimbursable?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the language of the agreement. At the conclusion of peace, article 12 says the expenses caused by the internment shall be made good.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the convention which the gentleman speaks of, and am somewhat familiar with it, but have we not there in our possession now citizens of Mexico who are not engaged in war?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I will give the gentleman what we have. Gen. Aleshire furnished information to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and said that we have at San Diego, Cal., since December 31, 1913, 426 officers and enlisted men. At Fort Bliss, since January 31 of this year, following the fight on that date, there are 3,180 enlisted men. There are 426 officers and 1,256 women and 554 children. At Fort McIntosh there are 7 officers and 30 enlisted men, making a total we have in those three camps of 5,879 up to the present time who have been there since December 31 and January 31.

Mr. Speaker, I realize the burden we have assumed in following this course, but there was no other course open to the United States except to follow laws which the nations of the earth have accepted and agreed to in the interest of humanity. An instance of that can be given during the Franco-Prussian War, when a number of French soldiers fleeing from battle escaped into Switzerland. The Swiss Government did not undertake to force them to return and meet the Germans and suffer imprisonment, death, or wounds in battle, but it disarmed them. The Swiss Government interned them. It kept them until the end of the war, when peace was ratified; and it is presumed, and it is true, that the French Government made good the expenses incurred by the Swiss Government in that particular. I have undertaken to give the House all information with reference to the fact——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, without reading further at this time, I shall incorporate into my remarks an extract from Moore's Digest of International Law upon the subject of the internment of fugitive troops, which, in addition to The Hague convention to which I have already called attention, will demonstrate clearly to the country that this Government is simply pursuing its duty and obligations, and no matter what the burden on the United States Government may be, it can do nothing else except to conform to its obligations and to the laws of humanity in this particular. I quote:

INTERNMENT OF FUGITIVE TROOPS.

Although a neutral must not lend his territory for purposes of war, he may receive a beaten army or individual fugitives, provided he disarms them and does not allow them again to engage in the war. But as he can not be expected to provide for them himself, and as to require either belligerent to pay for their support would be indirectly aiding the other, "perhaps the equity of the case and the necessity of precaution might both be satisfied by the release of such fugitives under a convention between the neutral and belligerent States, by which the latter should undertake not to employ them during the continuance of the war."

When belligerent troops, in order to escape the other belligerent, take refuge in neutral territory, if they do not lay down their arms they should be compelled to do so by the neutral sovereign. In such case they are protected by the law of nations from the opposing belligerent. This, it is true, is contested by Bynkershoek. "But Bynkershoek is not supported by the practice of nations. Some writers on public law maintain the sounder doctrine, that when the flying enemy has entered neutral territory he is placed immediately under the protection of the neutral power, and that there is no exception to the rule that every voluntary entrance into neutral territory, with hostile purposes, is absolutely unlawful. The Government of the United States has invariably claimed the absolute inviolation of neutral territory."

ARTICLE 57.

A neutral State which receives in its territory troops belonging to the belligerent armies shall intern them, as far as possible, at a distance from the theater of war.

"It can keep them in camps, and even confine them in fortresses or locations assigned for this purpose.

"It shall decide whether officers may be left at liberty on giving their parole that they will not leave the neutral territory without authorization.

ARTICLE 58.

"Failing a special convention, the neutral State shall supply the interned with the food, clothing, and relief required by humanity.

"At the conclusion of peace, the expenses caused by the internment shall be made good.

ARTICLE 59.

"A neutral State may authorize the passage through its territory of wounded or sick belonging to the belligerent armies, on condition that the trains bringing them shall carry neither combatants nor war material. In such a case, the neutral State is bound to adopt such measures of safety and control as may be necessary for the purpose.

"Wounded and sick brought under these conditions into neutral territory by one of the belligerents, and belonging to the hostile party, must be guarded by the neutral State, so as to insure their not taking part again in the military operations. The same duty shall devolve on the neutral State with regard to wounded or sick of the other army who may be committed to its care.

ARTICLE 60.

"The Geneva convention applies to sick and wounded interned in neutral territory."

Convention respecting the laws and customs of war on land, signed at the Hague, July 29, 1899, annex, regulations, section 4, on the Internment of Belligerents and the Care of the Wounded in Neutral Countries (32 Stat., 11, 1824).

It may be that we will not be recompensed for this great expenditure of public money; but there are a great many things for which we have to spend money in order to enable us to perform our duties as an international power.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. For a brief one.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. How long must we care for these soldiers, these refugees?

Mr. BARTLETT. Until peace is declared, is the obligation under The Hague convention and under the law of nations.

There is one other matter I desire to call attention to in this conference report, and it is in reference to the Panama Canal. This conference report carries a Senate amendment, permitting the President to appoint and pay $25,000 out of the sum appropriated for the maintenance of the canal in order that certain people may be appointed commissioners to aid in celebrating the opening of the canal. That could not be done out of the money now appropriated except by special legislation, authorizing the President, and that is upon this bill. For myself, I do not agree that we should appropriate——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. For a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The question I want to ask the gentleman is whether the United States was going to take any part in the celebration of the opening of the canal?

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not tell the gentleman; I do not know. This is for the opening of the Panama Canal at Panama and not in California—not for that celebration. Now, I do not believe that the money ought to be used for that purpose—to provide jobs for those who are about to go out of office, to create a new office and pay them for that purpose; nor do I agree it would be good policy that this amendment, as it does, should repeal the wholesome general law which provides, in case Army or Naval officers are appointed to perform some additional service, that they shall receive this addition to the pay that they receive as such officers. It has been the policy of this Government almost from its foundation, whenever our military or naval officers are called upon to perform any other duty, it should be without any addition to their pay as such officers. This was done to prevent these officers from seeking these appointments. This provision contravenes this wholesome policy of our Government. I do not propose to suggest anything else in reference to this amendment. I simply voice my own sentiments about it. Doubtless the President has good reason for it, and I do not question it; but, so far as I am concerned, I am unwilling to permit this extraordinary provision of law to be incorporated into this bill without calling attention to it and voicing my objection to it. The following letter will explain why it was incorporated here:

FEBRUARY 28, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with the authority given me by the Panama Canal act, I have issued an Executive order doing away with the Isthmian Canal Commission and establishing the permanent government of the Canal Zone under a governor, to take effect April 1, 1914.

As a result of this action the services of several members of the Isthmian Canal Commission will no longer be needed, and they will therefore discontinue their official connection with the Panama Canal.

I feel that after the able work done on the Isthmus by the Isthmian Canal Commission these members should have some official connection with the formal opening of the Panama Canal, which was directed under the Panama Canal act and which is set for approximately the first of next year. In order to cover this matter it has been suggested that these gentlemen might be appointed to a special commission, which should, under the governor, have charge of and be present at the formal opening of the canal, such commission to serve for a compensation which would be set by me. In order that these gentlemen may have their formal service with the Panama Canal continuous it is desired that I be authorized to announce the commission at an early date, and, if practicable, before the abolition of the Isthmian Canal Commission. I would therefore suggest the advisability of adding to the urgent deficiency bill a clause which will give me the necessary authority, it being noted that the Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that I have not the authority to make payment to such a commission under existing appropriations. The clause referred to is as follows:

"For the purpose of paying the expenses of formally and officially opening the Panama Canal, as provided in section 4 of the Panama Canal act, including the compensation of such persons as may be appointed by the President to provide for such opening, the President is authorized to use, out of the moneys heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the construction, completion, operation, or maintenance of the Panama Canal, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. The appointment of persons in the military and naval service of the United States is hereby expressly authorized: Provided, That if any person so appointed shall be employed in either the military or naval service of the United States, the amount of compensation fixed by the President under this resolution shall be in addition to the official salary paid to such person."

Very truly, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the provision to which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] refers authorizes the President to appoint certain persons, and permits the payment of $25,000 in connection with the celebration of the opening of the Panama Canal. On the 1st of April, next Wednesday, the permanent organization under the Panama act goes into effect. The purpose of this provision is to enable the President to appoint those men who have been intimately identified with the construction of the canal to participate officially in its opening. It was believed that those who had so long served on the zone in the work of construction of the canal should be thus recognized and permitted to participate in that opening. While I agree very much with what the gentleman from Georgia has said, under the circumstances and taking into account existing conditions, it seems to me proper that these men should be permitted in an official manner to be identified in the opening of this wonderful work to which they have given so much energy and talent.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For what purpose?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to make a few remarks. Can the gentleman yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. MANN. I desire to ask the gentleman as to Senate amendment 52, in reference to the formal opening of the Panama Canal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have just explained that—while the gentleman was occupied.

Mr. MANN. There was so much confusion I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was to permit the President—I will repeat it—to appoint the men who have been identified with this undertaking to have charge of the opening, as they go out of office on the 1st of April.

Mr. MANN. Did the committee take into consideration at all the desirability or the possibility of the Congress of the United States being officially represented at the time of the formal opening of the canal?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was not before the committee at the time; but some provision may be made later. There was no suggestion made. This was upon the request of the President, who explained the situation; and it seemed to be the unanimous agreement that some provision should be made.

Mr. MANN. Did the committee take into consideration, also, the question as to whether the British Parliament would be formally represented at the formal opening of the Panama Canal, since they claim they own it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the committee devoted itself strictly to public business. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask permission to extend my remarks by including certain authorities.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. BARTLETT. And to print a letter from the President on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Can not the gentleman make it 10 minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think I have it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, amendments numbered 29 and 44, providing for the Department of Labor and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which is one of its bureaus, have reduced the amounts appropriated. Amendment numbered 29 was for the purpose, as I sought, to get an appropriation here of $28,000 for the continuation of the research work in relation to industrial accidents and industrial diseases, to find the causes and remedies for them. The House withheld its consent to the appropriation. The Senate amended it by putting in $5,000, which was $23,000 less than asked for for this purpose. I succeeded, or we succeeded, rather, in securing an amendment in the House increasing from $3,000 to $30,000 the appropriation for printing for which the department had asked $8,000.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics had asked for $28,000, making $36,000 in all, for the printing of the reports that have been compiled there and that ought at some time or other be published, or else they ought to put that bureau out of business altogether. There is no use to have the work done and then not have the reports of it published. The item was $30,000, and it was reduced to $8,000, thereby practically cutting out the Bureau of Labor Statistics altogether.

Now, gentlemen, I want to say this, that the House put itself in an absurd position as to this amendment for the $29,000 for the continuation of this research work as to diseases and accidents when, a few days ago, it appropriated $600,000 for hog cholera and refused $29,000 for diseases and accidents for humankind. It has an opportunity to-day to redeem itself from that ridiculous position that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has put it in by misleading argument, stating that this was not needed and that the law was being violated, and so forth, which is not true. Now, if the Members of this House see fit to let themselves go on record as refusing this small amount of money for the continuation of this work, let them vote for the conference report and it will put them in that position.

If it desires to show that it has some sympathy with the laboring people of this country, whose lives are at the mercy of industrial diseases and accidents, it should vote against this motion to agree to the conference report. I believe if the Members of this House knew just what they were voting on, those amendments would have been put in here. Of course, I did not expect any effort to be made to retain the $30,000, and I am not at all surprised that that amendment was not only disagreed to in the Senate but that there was a disagreement as to the $5,000 which the Senate put in for the Bureau of Labor Statistics. It seems to me that that substantiates about everything I have said in regard to the matter as to the attitude of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to matters concerning labor.

Now, I hope this Congress, the Democrats at least, will not permit themselves to be put in such an attitude against labor. Some of us labor fellows have been feeling that through the Democratic Party we could hope to get some relief that had been denied while the Republican Party was in power. Now here is to a certain extent a test in regard to the matter. What are you going to do? The Republicans since they have gotten into the minority seem to have seen the errors of their ways, and have been voting on labor questions as they should vote as representatives of the people of this country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, on a previous occasion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] used much of the argument which he has just made and which I propose to demonstrate, when there is ample opportunity, is fully without justification. I have made no statements that were not accurate in connection with any of the appropriation bills. I do not parade my friendliness with labor as my sole political asset as some other gentlemen seem to do.

This bill carries the March pay rolls for the labor on the Panama Canal. It contains a provision, of which the gentleman from Illinois has no knowledge, but which I was instrumental in framing and having put into this bill, to prevent the reduction of the compensation of the labor on the Panama Canal on the 1st of April. There is more in this bill of real benefit to labor than the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] has yet ascertained. There were two amendments put in here by the Senate. One reduced an appropriation made by the House from $30,000 to $8,000 for printing. The Department of Labor estimated for only $8,000. There was no estimate for $30,000, and the Senate declined to permit gentlemen, by making the character of statements that have been made in support of it, to have money appropriated that the department had not even asked, in accordance with the law, to be given.

The other item was to increase the appropriation for the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The committee did not recommend it in the House. It was shown that the bureau was clearly violating the law in the manner in which it was expending this appropriation. The House declined to increase the appropriation, and in the adjustment of the differences upon this bill this amendment was not agreed to. I am convinced that this conference report does what should be done, and I hope it will be agreed to by the House.

I now move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this on the previous question?

The SPEAKER. This is on agreeing to the conference report. The previous question has been ordered. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 209, answered "present" 2, not voting 68, as follows:

Mr. BURNETT with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. BLACKMON with Mr. AINEY.

Mr. HEFLIN with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, I find I have a general pair with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. CLARK. I voted "no." I wish to change my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. KREIDER, and he answered "Present."

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the bells do not ring in my office, and I did not hear the bell in time to get here to vote. I am on the Committee on Enrolled Bills and the bell does not work there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I ask unanimous consent to vote, on account of the fact that the bells do not ring in the room of the Committee on Enrolled Bills. I would like to vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to have the gentleman vote any way he pleases, but the rule has to be enforced.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "no."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. BULKLEY. I came in just too late.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the name of the gentleman from Maine, Mr. HINDS, was called on the second roll call. I heard him vote on the first roll call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he ought to be allowed to vote.

Mr. MANN. He voted.

Mr. KAHN. He did vote.

Mr. GARDNER. He was standing right there [indicating] when he voted.

The SPEAKER. He will be recorded as voting.

Mr. GARDNER. He voted "no."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Several Members having changed their votes,

Mr. MURDOCK. Are all of these changes that we have just witnessed a part of the RECORD? Do they go into the RECORD? None of this transaction is visible to-morrow, is it?

The SPEAKER. None of this is visible in the RECORD. It simply makes changes in the record of the vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a further insistence on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is it in order to make a motion to instruct the conferees of the House on any of the amendments?

The SPEAKER. After the conferees are appointed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will be given his opportunity to make his motion.

Mr. GARDNER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. Would it not be in order to move to recede from further disagreement to a Senate amendment and concur in the same?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order to recede from the disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN]——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that is not in order. I wish to state my motion, and then gentlemen can get what recognition they are entitled to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendments and asks for a conference.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conferees of the House be instructed to agree to the Senate amendment numbered 29 and disagree to Senate amendment numbered 44.

The SPEAKER. That is not a preferential motion until the conference is ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment 29, and agree to the same. I make that statement so that my colleague [Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois] may make the motion, as I do not desire to take his place.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the motion that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment 29, relating to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 29, and agree to the same. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

For per diem, in lieu of subsistence of special agents and employees while traveling on duty away from their homes and outside of the District of Columbia, at a rate not to exceed $3 per day, and for their transportation, and for employment of experts and temporary assistance, to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $8 per day, and for traveling expenses of officers and employees, $5,000.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment just reported and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask a separate vote on further insisting upon the disagreement of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have made the motion to further insist on the disagreement to all of the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I ask for a separate vote on amendment 44.

Mr. LANGLEY. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 10, strike out the figures "$30,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$8,000."

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. MANN. I ask for a separate vote on further insisting on the disagreement of the House to that amendment, and on that motion I ask for a division. Let us have a rising vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 215, noes none.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out the word "Peppers," in line 11, page 38, and inserting the word "Pepper."

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has information, which of course may not be entirely reliable, that the members of that family, except the late Congressman, spell the name P-e-p-p-e-r-s.

Mr. GOOD. Then I simply move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 39, and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 39: Page 31, after line 20, insert:
"To pay to John Peppers, father of Irvin S. Pepper, late a Representative from the State of Iowa, $7,500."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 39, and agree to the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to make this statement: The House has never extended the granting of gratuities to relatives of deceased Members beyond the widow, children, or dependent relatives residing with the Member. The Committee on Appropriations did not include this amendment in the bill because it did not come within any of those categories.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any precedent for this?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no precedent on the part of the House. I believe that the Senate has gone much further than the House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield two minutes to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the conferees on the part of the House did the only thing that they could do as to this amendment. It was inserted in the Senate without any request from the Committee on Appropriations, and it proposed an item relating solely to the matters of the House. In my judgment, the conferees could not do otherwise than insist upon the Senate receding from that amendment; but what the conferees could do under the circumstances and what the House itself can do are quite different propositions; and while, in my judgmnet, it would not have been proper for the conferees to have permitted the Senate, on its own motion, to interfere with the management of matters in the House, yet I think the House itself is quite justified in agreeing to the amendment, although it was inserted by the Senate. My recollection, as far as it goes, is that we have always paid this gratuity on the death of each Member of the House since I have been here. I do not think there has been any exception, and I do not believe an exception ought to be made now. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I had not completed what I was about to say. When the item was before the Committee on Appropriations the information before the committee was to the effect that Mr. Pepper's father was residing with some of his other children, and that he was not in such circumstances as to call for this gratuity. That statement was made by a Member, sitting in his seat on the floor when the bill was under consideration. Since that time Members of the House representing the State of Iowa have been in correspondence with persons intimately acquainted with the family of the deceased Member, and they have stated that Mr. Peppers is so situated as to justify an exception being made in this case, if none had ever been made heretofore. It is a matter which Members must determine for themselves. I have no desire to attempt to influence the action of any Member. I believe that I have stated the situation as it is. It is for the House to determine whether this gratuity shall be extended in this case. As stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], those representing the House in the conference did not feel justified in agreeing to the Senate amendment, which peculiarly and intimately affected the House and about which the Senate had no right to interfere. The matter is now before the House to dispose of as it may deem proper.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does my colleague remember the case of a Member from Rhode Island who at the time of his death was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and he had a dependent sister living with him.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. She was a sister, not a dependent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A dependent sister, a member of his household. I know the case to which the gentleman refers. I have tried to give the House all the information that will enable Members to act intelligently in this case, without expressing any opinion as to the wisdom or expediency of action either one way or the other.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa. Is it not a fact that these appropriations have been made before? I remember an appropriation to pay the nephews and nieces of Senator Allison, and they were all people in easy circumstances.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate, as I have already stated, has extended the practice much wider than has ever been the custom of the House.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that when this matter was up in the House the gentleman who made the point of order against the amendment stated that he had information from somebody—I have never found out who gave it—that Mr. Pepper, the father, was a man of means. I am thoroughly convinced that this was misinformation, and if any case is justifiable for this customary appropriation, the Pepper case is one. Mr. Pepper's father is an elderly man, just going down the hill of life, a man in quite moderate circumstances, enfeebled in health, and broken in spirit over the loss of his beloved son, my own dear friend. He is not, as was stated on the floor of the House, a man in easy circumstances. I have letters establishing that fact; and, as I say, if there was ever any justification for this custom, the Pepper case is one. There were instances of appropriations by the Congress to nephews and nieces of Members who were in very comfortable circumstances. I hope that the Members of the House who have voted in the past to give appropriations to wealthy widows and beneficiaries whose estates ran up into the hundreds of thousands will not refuse to do what is simple justice in this instance. Congressman Pepper gave his time and most honorable career to public service. His talents and efforts were devoted to his townsmen, to his State, and to the Nation, for which he had a most genuine and abiding affection. I hope the House will vote for the amendment and, while this custom obtains, not discriminate or make an exception to a case such as this, that must appeal to your sense of fairness and the spirit of kindly sentiment that actuated the establishment of such a custom. [Applause.]

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I want to say to the House that John Pepper is a very aged man and a neighbor of mine. I have known him for more than half a century. I state without fear of successful contradiction that he is a poor man. He is the father of our late colleague, and, as I say, I have known him for 60 years. I know him to be a man of truth and deserving consideration. I ask Members to disabuse their minds of what has been said on the floor of the House that he is a man in easy circumstances. I want to emphasize the fact that, he being a neighbor of mine, I know his circumstances, and they are as I have stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to recede and concur in the Senate amendment 39.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the balance of the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. GILLETT.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINDEL. I have been accused by the Post Office Department of violating the postal laws in regard to the franking privilege. I have my statement written, and it will not take much time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. SPARKMAN. To move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. But the question of personal privilege takes precedence.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the personal privilege to explain, not in anger but in pity, to the Members of the House and the public in general, what occasioned the charge of the Post Office Department that I had violated the franking privilege, which I emphatically deny.

Since my incumbency as a Member of your honorable body I have been busily engaged, from 12 to 16 hours per day, in working out three distinct, new, and effective parcel-post rate graduates and zone systems, apparently much to the discomfiture of the Post Office Department. In "Who's Who" I am recorded not as a Congressman but as a manufacturer and a student of transportation of acknowledged ability and renown. This, together with my several speeches on the subject of parcel-post and express rates that have appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, created a surprising demand upon me for my speeches, leaflets, and maps. Not only did I supply my constituents but the public generally, which latter was done in part through other Congressmen, and all without one cent of reward or personal gain; and here I wish to emphasize the fact that I am $1,500 worse off now than before I became a Congressman, in spite of my simple and frugal personal habits.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why does not the gentleman call the Carnegie Peace Society to his aid?

Mr. KINDEL. I do not have to. I will take care of this proposition myself. [Laughter and applause.]

If this be treason or violation of the law, then make the most of it. [Applause.]

To show how silly this controversy is, I present the entire correspondence in the matter.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, March 10, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE J. KINDEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KINDEL: This office is in receipt of a copy of a speech delivered by you in the House of Representatives on January 16, 1914, on the back of which is a hand-stamped imprint, not printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, reading as follows:

"Every citizen will profit by studying the tables contained in KINDEL'S speech on express and parcel-post rates. Copies of speech in franked envelopes delivered to your address at the rate of: One copy, free; 10 copies, 10 cents; 100 copies, $1; 1,000 copies, $10; 10,000 copies, $100. Address, GEORGE J. KINDEL, M. C., Washington, D. C.," which was mailed, free of postage, in an envelope bearing your frank.

In this connection I inclose a copy of an opinion of the Assistant Attorney General for the Post Office Department, dated March 9, 1914, in which it is held that the addition of the imprint to copies of your speech renders them unfrankable under the law. I will therefore thank you to give me any information you may have as to the number of copies mailed under frank, in order that the postage with which they are chargeable may be determined.

Yours, very truly—

It has an unreadable signature, but I afterwards found out that it was A. M. Dockery, Third Assistant Postmaster General. [Laughter.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, March 9, 1914.

THIRD ASSISTANT,
Division of Classification:

I have considered your letter of March 4, 1914, submitting pamphlet of a speech of Representative GEORGE J. KINDEL, delivered in the House of Representatives on January 16, 1914, on the back of which is an imprint reading as follows:

"Every citizen will profit by studying the tables contained in KINDEL'S speech on express and parcel-post rates. Copies of speech in franked envelopes delivered to your address at the rate of 1 copy free; 10 copies, 10 cents; 100 copies, $1; 1,000 copies, $10; 10,000 copies, $100. Address GEORGE J. KINDEL, M. C., Washington, D. C."

This imprint is not a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

You ask to be advised whether the imprint is, under the law, a permissible addition to copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or parts thereof, mailed under frank in parcels not exceeding 4 ounces in weight.

The law authorizing the franking of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and parts thereof by Members of Congress is section 5 of the Postal Service appropriation act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. L., 343), which is as follows:

"That from and after the passage of this act the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or any part thereof, or speeches or reports therein contained, shall, under the frank of a Member of Congress, or Delegate, to be written by himself, be carried in the mail free of postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General shall prescribe."

On December 19, 1913, I advised you that, under the provisions of this act, the addition of an index, which did not appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, made to a pamphlet containing speeches delivered in the Senate, rendered the matter unmailable under the frank of a Senator. This opinion was in accord with a former opinion of this office of November 3, 1905 (4 Ops. A. A. G. P. O. D., p. 1), in which a similar ruling was made.

The addition of the imprint on the back of the pamphlet submitted by you in this case appears to me to be a more flagrant violation of the letter and the spirit of the act than the added index in the case cited, in view of the fact that the index related to the subject matter of the speeches included in the pamphlet, while the matter contained in the stamp is advertising and relates solely to the sale and distribution of the pamphlet in this case. You are therefore advised that the addition of the imprint renders the pamphlet of Mr. KINDEL'S speech unmailable under the act above quoted.

The following appears in the imprint on the speech above referred to: "Copies of speech in franked envelopes delivered to your address at the rate of 1 copy free; 10 copies, 10 cents; 100 copies, $1," etc. Apparently, Mr. KINDEL proposes not only to frank this unfrankable matter in bulk, in direct violation of law, but to sell to the purchaser the right to use the frank in the distribution of the matter by the purchaser himself.

The act of January 12, 1895 (ch. 23, sec. 85, 28 Stat. L., 601, 622), confers authority for franking public documents printed by order of Congress. This office has decided that two conditions are necessary to authorize the franking of matter mentioned therein:

1. That the matter shall be sent or received by one of the designated parties; and

2. That the matter transmitted shall be a public document printed by order of Congress.

The opinion continues:

"This statute does not give the right to Congressmen to extend to others the privilege of sending public documents printed by order of Congress through the mails, but simply gives the right to Congressmen themselves to send such documents. This, of course, does not mean that the actual mailing of the documents shall be made by the Congressman, but simply that the mailing shall be in truth the sending by the Congressman of such matter." (4 Ops. A. A. G. P. O. D., p. 4.)

Section 494 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, authorizing the sending of franked matter in bulk to an addressee, who may address and mail it, was adopted under authority of the act in question. This section authorizes the placing of addresses on such franked matter by the addressee only 'on behalf of" the Congressman whose frank is used, and can not be extended so as to legalize such a transaction as the one in question, where the privilege itself is being made the subject of sale, and the proceeds of which flow to the Congressman whose frank is thus being used. Aside from the fact that none of the pamphlets are subject to frank, in view of the addition of this imprint, as explained in the first part of this opinion, even if they were originally frankable, their distribution by a purchaser under the frank would be illegal.

You are further advised that the advertising features of the imprint render the pamphlet unmailable as official correspondence under section 492 of the Postal Laws and Regulations.

The pamphlet is returned to you herewith.

W. H. LAMAR,
Assistant Attorney General.

(Inclosure.)

On March 12 I called upon the Third Assistant Postmaster General and explained that in all I must have sent out 200,000 pieces of mail, more or less, all of which to a greater or less degree must be in violation of the law, if the interpretation and finding of the Assistant Attorney General is correct, but that I could not agree with him, and until I am tried and found guilty by the Supreme Court of the United States I shall not pay any attention to his intended threat of intimidation. [Applause.] The next day I received the following farcical letter from the Third Assistant Postmaster General: [Laughter.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, March 13, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE J. KINDEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KINDEL: Referring to your call of yesterday regarding copies of your speech delivered in the House of Representatives on January 16, 1914, mailed under your frank, bearing a hand-stamped imprint, not printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, reading as follows:

"Every citizen will profit by studying the tables contained in KINDEL'S speech on express and parcel-post rates. Copies of speech in franked envelopes delivered to your address at the rate of 1 copy free; 10 copies, 10 cents; 100 copies, $1; 1,000 copies, $10; 10,000 copies, $100; address GEORGE J. KINDEL, M. C., Washington, D. C.," concerning which you were informed on March 10, 1914, that the Assistant Attorney General for the Post Office Department had held it was not a permissible addition under the law, and therefore rendered the copies unfrankable, when you stated that about 200,000 copies of the speech, bearing such hand-stamped imprint, had been mailed by you, I have to say that if the speeches were unsealed they were subject to postage at the third-class rate, which would amount to $2,000; or if sealed they were chargeable with postage at the first-class rate, amounting to $4,000. It therefore appears from your statement that you now owe the Government of the United States at least $2,000 on account of postage chargeable on such copies. If you should continue to send out copies of your speech bearing such hand-stamped imprint, your liability to the Government would, of course, be increased in proportion to the number of such copies mailed.

In this connection I have to say that this department is, as you know, charged with the duty of administering the postal statutes, and in taking this matter up with you it is merely in pursuance of the duty imposed by law. I might add that if it is your desire to mail copies with such hand-stamped imprint, and you should procure the printing of it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it would then be frankable, but such fact would not relieve you of the liability for the postage on the unfrankable copies heretofore mailed.

Yours, very truly,

A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

In reply to it I wrote as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 14, 1914.

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR:

I discovered that he had been a governor of some State. [Laughter.]

Your letter of March 13 duly received and noted.

I have nothing to say in the matter further than what I have already stated to you as my opinion and the stand I take in this case.

I think that you will recognize the fact that your action in this case is proving nothing short of a boomerang. Such is the opinion of everybody with whom I have discussed the matter.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. J. KINDEL.

P. S.—As far as I am concerned, I consider this incident closed.

G. J. K.

[Laughter and applause.]

Now, I particularly call attention to the citation by the Assistant Attorney General in the first of these letters, which reads:

This statute does not give the right to Congressmen to extend to others the privilege of sending public documents printed by order of Congress through the mails, but simply gives the right to Congressmen themselves to send such documents. This, of course, does not mean that the actual mailing of the documents shall be made by the Congressman, but simply that the mailing shall be in truth the sending by the Congressman of such matter. (4 Ops. A. A. G. P. O. D., p. 4.)

I believe there are few, if any, of my Democratic colleagues who did not, like myself, mail out wagon loads of literature sent them by the national Democratic campaign committee. I frankly confess that this privilege was accorded me before I was elected to Congress, and that I unwittingly assisted the Democratic Party in what, according to the above quotation, was a violation of the law.

It is only the prejudiced or willfully blind who could construe my action as having any purpose other than the minimizing of the wholesale demand for my speeches by the thoughtless, without making a detailed explanation of the fact that every Congressman must pay for the printing of the speeches that he sends out, regardless of the merit of the subject matter or value to the general public interest.

On account of the notoriety given this offense (?) of mine, countless newspaper clippings from all parts of the country have come under my notice, of which the following is an example:

[Editorial, New York Sun, March 21, 1914.]

MR. KINDEL'S "EQUITABLE AND FAIR TRANSPORTATION" IDEAS.

The Post Office Department has made out a bill for $4,000 against the Hon. GEORGE JOHN KINDEL, Representative from the first Colorado district, for postage on 200,000 copies of a speech which Mr. KINDEL franked through the mail under the title "Part of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD." Mr. Dockery, the Third Assistant Postmaster General, declares that the speech was not printed in the RECORD, and that therefore Mr. KINDEL must pay up like other folks for his use of the mails. Mr. KINDEL is evidently a deep student of the Constitution, the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the rules of the House of Representatives, for he says:

"I am answerable to the Supreme Court alone for my actions."

Mr. KINDEL is a candidate for Senator from Colorado, which explains his enthusiasm for wholesale correspondence. What are his principles? They are officially set forth in his autobiography in the Congressional Directory:

"Since 1892 has been in the courts contesting the discriminative freight and express rates which prevail against Colorado; by this means was brought into politics.

"At the late [1912] election he ran as a progressive Democrat in the first district of Colorado and received 54,504 votes, running between 3,000 and 5,000 ahead of the National and State tickets, which proves conclusively that the people of Colorado are wide awake to the needs of fair and equitable transportation.

"Because the commercial organizations opposed him in his endeavors for fair transportation rates he joined the Grangers, whose backing he has, and whose interests he will endeavor to champion."

If Mr. Dockery is correctly informed, Mr. KINDEL'S notion of "equitable" and "fair" transportation rates is to get $4,000 worth of postal transportation free for his campaign documents, regardless of the origin of those precious contributions to knowledge.

Mr. KINDEL is by trade an upholsterer and mattress maker and renovator. Perhaps it is from his occupation that he derives his ideas of the propriety of stuffing the mails.

[Prolonged laughter.]

The question occurs to me, Why am I thus made the goat when obviously others have knowingly committed offenses a hundredfold greater? [Laughter.] See Senate resolution 92, part 61, date of March 12, 1914, page 4762, "Use of United States postal frank." Can it be in retaliation for my hinted-at impeachment proceedings against the Postmaster General for incompetency? [Laughter.]

I have asked for the privilege of making these statements not only for my own satisfaction and vindication, but also for the information and guidance of my esteemed colleagues. [Laughter and applause.]

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to receive from private parties such funds as may be contributed by them to be expended in connection with funds appropriated by the United States for any authorized work of public improvement of rivers and harbors whenever such work and expenditure may be considered by the Chief of Engineers as advantageous to the interests of navigation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington rose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is a member of the committee, and the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it to the desk.

Mr. MANN. But an amendment is not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he has instructed the Clerk not to report it until the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has been disposed of.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether this section has been carried in the prior river and harbor act?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that it has. It was carried and appeared for the first time in the river and harbor bill of 1913.

Mr. STAFFORD. In identically the same phraseology?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In identically the same phraseology.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to how many instances there are where private parties provide funds for river and harbor improvements?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I could not answer that offhand, but there are quite a number of them. The most of these come in response to provisions in the river and harbor bills and are attached as conditions to the doing of work upon a project.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does it involve cases where private establishments, business concerns, wishing to have some river and harbor improvements done contribute to some of the funds provided by the National Government?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 65, at the end of line 3, by inserting as a separate section the following:

"That section 4 of an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved July 5, 1884, is hereby repealed."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any question about the amendment being in order. It is simply to repeal a portion of an act that was passed in 1884.

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, I think there is no question that it is not in order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask to have the amendment again reported for the information of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, for information, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the section of the act of 1884 which it is proposed to repeal by this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the section.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That no tolls or operating charges whatsoever shall be levied or collected upon any vessel or vessels, dredges, or other passing water craft through any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation belonging to the United States; and for the purpose of preserving and continuing the use and navigation of said canals, rivers, and other public works without interruption, the Secretary of War, upon the application of the chief engineer in charge of said works, is hereby authorized to draw his warrant or requisition from time to time upon the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the actual expenses of operating and keeping said works in repair, which warrants or requisitions shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, however, That an itemized statement of said expenses shall accompany the annual report of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not in order. It is true that the amendment proposes to repeal a section in a former river and harbor appropriation act, but that does not make it in order at this time. The only jurisdiction that the committee has in reference to this bill is the improvement of rivers and harbors. This bill comes before the House as a privileged bill, but the privilege extends only to the improvement of rivers and harbors. Nor would the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, under the rules of the House, have jurisdiction of this matter if it were introduced as an original bill. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has jurisdiction of such matter, unless it should be tolls upon a canal, in which case the Committee on Canals would have jurisdiction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I might suggest to the gentleman that this also repeals a permanent appropriation, of which the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. I did not notice that feature of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman that this amendment is not in order; and I am particularly interested, because, regardless of the feature of repealing the provision prohibiting the imposition of tolls, this amendment repeals the permanent appropriation for the maintenance and operation of canals in the United States. Under the section of the law proposed to be repealed, there is permanently appropriated the money required to operate and maintain these canals. My recollection is that it aggregates about $1,250,000 annually. I believe that the appropriation should be repealed, and that detailed estimates for this service should be annually submitted to Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman believes that it ought to be repealed, after looking carefully into it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it would be unwise to provide for its repeal in this way without any provision whatever being made for the submission of annual estimates or any provision having been made for carrying on the work during the coming fiscal year. The section proposed to be repealed is without the limits of jurisdiction conferred on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which makes the bill a privileged bill, and under repeated rulings I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this particular amendment is not in order.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to be heard?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I desire to offer an amendment. I thought the Chair told the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill comes to the House a privileged bill—no further, however, than it is privileged by the rules. The rules confer upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the right to report bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors. It would hardly be contended this amendment comes within the general powers of the committee. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken, and sustains it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, this section would give the Secretary of War authority to receive from private parties funds to be used in connection with funds appropriated by the Federal Government for river and harbor improvements. This brings to my mind the policy which some engineers are following, or the policy they suggest should be followed in the matter of harbor improvements, in that in some cases they have refused to report favorably where there has been no contribution of private funds, on the theory that the Federal Government ought not to be asked to bear all expenses, but that private interests ought to make liberal contribution.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. This does not authorize the Secretary of War to receive contributions unless he is specifically authorized to receive them on a particular project, does it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is the general policy which will prevail if this section of the bill is adopted. I am not opposing it. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to speak briefly of the policy of demanding private contributions, not as to the wisdom of accepting them if they are offered, and in regard to what seems to be a difference between the policy pursued by engineers in one part of the country and that pursued by engineers in another part of the country. I spoke briefly of this the other day when it seemed to me that a favorable report had been made by the engineers and favorable action taken by the committee, recommending an appropriation for a small river, I believe, on the coast of New Jersey, where as far as I was able to learn from the report and the statements made on the floor respecting it the improvement was made largely for local benefit.

It was said then by some gentlemen who were supporting the provision of the bill that it is justifiable and proper for the Federal Government to make an appropriation for improvement of a stream for the purposes of benefiting or convenienc-ing a manufacturing plant located thereon; that such appropriation and improvement following it are justifiable because they might result in increasing the number of factories on that stream, and might give larger opportunity for employment of labor. It was said by gentlemen approving the appropriation that in their opinion these are proper considerations and are proper reasons for making Federal appropriations. Now, if that policy has been followed by the engineers, or if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have looked favorably upon recommendations of that kind, then the policy of one engineer is different from another, and the attitude of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors with respect to proposed improvements is not the same in all cases. There are many harbors in my district, and I have had considerable experience with engineers and with committees of Congress. I know that some engineers refuse to listen to arguments or to yield to demands for favorable reports on projects which, in their judgment, are of local interest only. If in the opinion of these engineers the improvements requested are for local benefit, the appropriations must be refused. The engineers insist that benefits to be derived from appropriations must be of a general character, that the commerce carried on there or to be developed must be interstate in its character, and unless they are so, a favorable report is refused and it is impossible for appropriations to be made. I find also, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I find also, Mr. Chairman, what seems to me to be a difference between the policies pursued in one part of the country and another when appropriations are asked for the purpose of reimbursing a community or municipality for damages to streets or highways on account of harbor improvements. In one case an engineer makes a favorable report and the committee provides an appropriation; in another case, in another part of the country, an engineer reports unfavorably on a matter of this kind and our appeal to the committee receives no attention.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman if he can state any such cases of discrimination as those to which he refers?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes, sir. This bill carries an appropriation for reimbursing some municipality in the State of Kentucky on account of damages to one of the highways. In my city, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. POWERS. I would like for the gentleman to cite that instance in Kentucky.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Possibly it is not in Kentucky. I may be wrong in naming that State. It is in one of the States——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Florida.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It is in Florida. In my city, where extensive harbor work has been done, there is a break in one of the piers; an opening has been intentionally left; and when the waves roll into the harbor they break and spread out into the opening, and they are washing and wearing away the soil and destroying a street. The soil of the street is caving into the hole which has been left in the work done by the Government. An effort has been made to secure an appropriation either for completing the pier by filling up the gap or for sheet piling along the side of the street, but the engineer reports unfavorably. He says that navigation is not interfered with, and, even if it were, he says it will be cheaper to dredge the channel and take out the soil which has sloughed off by the action of the waves than it will be to fill up the gap in the pier or to sheet-pile along the side of the opening or along the street.

In the respects of which I have spoken there seems to me to be different policies followed by the engineers in different parts of the country.

Now, I have no complaint of the engineers and I have no complaint of the committees of Congress. I have been very courteously treated by them. I have found the engineers high-class gentlemen, giving very careful attention to their work, and I believe they are honest and sincere in all their conclusions. They have differed from me, and I have been and still am a long way from getting from them the reports and recommendations which I desire, and which I think are necessary and proper. And I have no fault to find with the committee, except, it seems to me, they follow the conclusions of the engineers. They do not go back of the conclusions to see the facts and the reasoning upon which those conclusions are based; and this course pursued by the committee gives rise to different policies respecting river and harbor improvement. I would perhaps have been successful in securing favorable consideration of some of the harbors in my district if the gentlemen of the committee had looked behind the conclusions of the engineers and had seen the facts and conditions as they are set out in the reports. I would certainly have obtained favorable reports of my harbor projects if they had been examined by the engineer who examined some of the projects on the Atlantic coast, and if the committee had done, as they did in respect of the eastern coast projects—simply permitted themselves to be governed by the conclusions of the engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, in response to the discrimination charge as made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, that he is mistaken as to that, so far as the committee is concerned, and the same can be said as to the Government engineers. In fact, I think the gentleman's last remarks relieve them entirely from the imputation which the first part of his remarks would perhaps show has been cast upon them. The case to which he referred was not in Kentucky, but in Florida, where, as I stated before, a canal had been cut across two public roads, and the engineers recommended, after an investigation, that the sum of $400 be paid in order to reimburse the county for damages resulting from that work.

Now, the case to which he has referred in his home town is entirely different from the one in Florida; besides, there has come to the committee no complaint, and I know of none to the engineers, about the damage done to the streets in his town. Whenever such a claim is made to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors it will receive careful consideration, whether it shall come through the engineers or not. It has always been the custom for Congress to pay for damages done to public country roads by the cutting of canals unless the furnishing of the right of way and the payment of damages by the county, locality, or other local interests was required as a condition to the doing of the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of making a statement.

A question has been asked of me as to what amount of money is appropriated in this bill. I have stated that $72,000,000 is the amount of money appropriated, except that $33,000,000 of that amount must be expended by future Congresses; but the projects are established or adopted by this Congress. In other words, $39,000,000 in cash is here appropriated and $33,000,000 in addition is authorized. That is right, is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. I will say to the gentleman he is mistaken about that. The amount authorized and appropriated in this bill is $43,289,004. Four million and sixty-one thousand five hundred dollars of that is placed in the bill by way of authorization, which would reduce the amount of cash to $39,227,504. I will show to my friend he has been led into error, no doubt. The new projects adopted, as I stated the other day, will require some $38,684,700.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will permit me, I am thoroughly familiar with that. We have gone over this matter two or three times, but will the gentleman explain to us why, if you have appropriated or provided $38,000,000, and you have only appropriated five million and some odd dollars toward those projects, you are going to have the remaining $33,000,000 employed in building these projects without future Congresses appropriating it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is true, but we have not yet made the appropriations.

Mr. FREAR. That is true. Then this is equally true, that you have hereby appropriated $39,000,000 of cash and $33,000,000 future Congresses must necessarily appropriate to carry out the projects provided here, for which you have appropriated $5,000,000 in this bill. You can not start the $5,000,000 appropriation unless you complete it.

Now just one more statement as to the total amount of money that is owed by this Government that will be required by these projects in the future. Three hundred and five million dollars is the amount of money this Government is now owing for river and harbor improvements, including the $43,000,000 that is under this appropriation bill and $33,000,000 more in new projects is proposed by that. That is a burden on this Government, is it not? That is your statement in the report?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is quite a difference between an authorization and an appropriation.

Mr. FREAR. Is there a difference between authorization and appropriation when you start a project that necessarily must be completed else all the money that is put into the project will be wasted? Five million dollars you have put into these projects, and you are providing that $33,000,000 must be appropriated in order to complete them.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the House thoroughly understands the matter.

Mr. FREAR. I think it does. At this point I want to thank the committee for the kind consideration given by it to me. I have taken a good deal of your time and appreciate the kindly feeling which you have manifested.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It will require future action by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and by Congress to appropriate these various sums of money, whereas in the case of an authorization the River and Harbor Committee has nothing further to do with it. The amount must be taken care of, if a contract is made, by the Appropriations Committee. But when the next session of Congress rolls around we can refuse to pass the river and harbor bill; we can refuse to appropriate any more money or we can cut out any or all of these projects. We can refuse to appropriate any more money.

Mr. FREAR. Then what becomes of the $39,000,000 in new projects, I will ask the gentleman, that you have started in with by a first expenditure of $5,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, they are for future consideration, except those that will be completed by these appropriations, and the large majority of them, something like 54, will be completed by the appropriations we are making in this bill.

Mr. FREAR. But the next committee, if the gentleman pleases, may establish $33,000,000 more in new projects, because you say here $92,000,000 were presented in addition—to which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] nods his head—and you refused to make appropriations for those projects; but the next committee may recommend that appropriation or the next House may make an appropriation and establish these new projects, amounting to $92,000,000 additional.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It may, but it is not likely.

Mr. FREAR. So that it is a continual charge.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The gentleman from Wisconsin stated the amount that is carried in the bill, though he expressed it a little differently from the way we express it, when he said that there was authorized so much. That word "authorized" has a particularly definite meaning here. But when we adopt a project, of course, it does mean that the Government has assumed the obligation to complete it.

The bill carries $43,400,000, in round figures. During the past several days the gentleman from Wisconsin has moved to strike out numerous items contained in the bill. I do not say now, and have not heretofore said, and shall not hereafter say anything in criticism of him for that. I am perfectly satisfied that he did it because he believed that by so doing he was serving his country well. It is just a difference of opinion.

Now, I have taken the trouble to examine the RECORD to ascertain just how much the gentleman from Wisconsin has proposed to reduce this bill by the numerous amendments which he has offered.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. My remarks, as they will eventually be printed in the RECORD, will show that I would strike out the proposition of $63,000,000 for the Ohio River, for which you are appropriating $5,000,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. As to the $7,000,000 for the lower Mississippi, I would strike that out. As to the $2,000,000 for the Missouri River, I would strike that out. The million and a half dollars for the upper Mississippi would be stricken out. It will take time and thorough examination to determine just what should be done on those projects recommended by these engineers. Those ought to be added to the statement that the gentleman has. I yielded the floor the other night and did not proceed further in the discussion because I did not want to consume more time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I was discussing the history that has been made and not the history to be made. The gentleman, having permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD, if I understand him now, will insert hereafter a motion to strike out an item that he did not ask to strike out when there was an opportunity to strike it out.

Mr. FREAR. Just a word there.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Just a moment. I have the items here. I have the Ohio River. I have, in fact, in this statement all that the gentleman did, in fact, move to strike out. But, of course, the House could not read his mind.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman accept now a statement?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; I do not yield. The House could not delve down into the gentleman's mind and find out that there was something hidden there and that he would like to strike out something in addition to those things that he did move to strike out when he discussed the bill and criticized it. He took his seat and did not make a motion to strike out any other projects and did not give the House an opportunity to vote on these other matters which he says were in his mind. The items which the gentleman moved to strike from the bill, not including the Ohio River, made a total of $568,225. Here they are, showing the page of the bill, the name of the project, the amount appropriated for each, and the tonnage of each—$568,225. That is how much less this $43,000,000 bill would be to-day if the gentleman from Wisconsin had had his way. "All his conquest, glories, victories, spoils, shrunk to this little measure:"

Now listen: The projects for which that amount, $568,225, is appropriated floated last year 3,520,335 tons of commerce. That is three times as much American tonnage as it is estimated will pass through the Panama Canal, and that is all represented by an appropriation of $568,225. The value of that commerce was $33,932,495.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know how long this filibuster is to continue? [Laughter.]

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, in view of the fact that I have only five minutes I hope I shall not be interrupted. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] during three days, after having devoted, as he tells us, a great deal of study to this bill, was able to point out appropriations aggregating $568,225, not including the Ohio River, which in his judgment ought to be stricken from the bill. The truth is he has made a very persistent and conscientious, though ineffective, effort to reduce the bill just that amount.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; ineffective. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And because the items are left in we are to understand that the gentleman is going to vote against the bill, although it provides for projects which last year floated more than a billion tons of commerce.

In addition to that, he moved to strike out the appropriation for the Ohio River, a stream which last year floated three times as much tonnage as is carried from coast to coast by all the transcontinental railroads combined, and six times as much American commerce floated on that river—running as it does for a thousand miles through one of the busiest valleys in the world—six times as much American commerce as is estimated will pass through the Panama Canal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to add simply this statement: The rivers appropriated for in this bill last year floated 369,000,000 tons. Think of it! It is estimated that the Panama Canal will carry only some ten or twelve million tons annually—American tonnage, coastwise, foreign, all combined. And only 20,000,000 tons passed through the Suez Canal last year. The rivers provided for in this bill last year, in other words, floated ten times as much commerce as the Panama Canal and the Suez Canal combined. And yet, because we would not strike from the bill the items that the gentleman from Wisconsin mentioned, the gentleman will vote against this bill, and would, if he had his way, cripple, if not destroy, the transportation facilities for which we are providing here, which last year floated more American commerce than will pass through the Panama Canal in the next 25 years.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No. I do not want to say anything in criticism of the gentleman. I know he is perfectly honest and sincere; but the wonderment to me is the mental process that can lead the gentleman to that conclusion.

Mr. FREAR. I am trying to give it to you, and you will not permit me.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I can only explain it on the old theory announced by the ancient prophet—that man is fearfully and wonderfully made. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Both.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. Does not the gentleman know that only 1,700,000 tons of freight went down past Lock 37 on the Ohio River?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, that is just one of the locks. I know that there were 9,000,000 tons floated on the river, all told.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is not fair. He does not give me an opportunity to ask him a question.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman had three or four days here. He made that statement yesterday, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] answered it thoroughly and completely.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. He talks about one lock only.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word in reply to the criticism of the committee made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN]. I think that criticism is entirely unjustified. So far as I know the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has never appropriated money for any purpose except for navigation. The only exception to that rule of which I am aware is an amendment adopted here in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the other day. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and not the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is responsible for that departure from a long-established rule.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; not just now. By that amendment it is proposed to make an appropriation of $125,000 to repair the bank of the Mississippi River. The report of the engineers says this is not in the interest of navigation. This is the first time we have ever started to depart from that rule. I am not going to make any further protest against that action except that perhaps I shall demand a roll call; but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that you have entered upon a very dangerous field, and when you vote to make that appropriation you understand that you are taking the responsibility and that it does not rest upon the Rivers and Harbors Committee. If this House wants to open up the floodgates and to appropriate countless millions of dollars to protect private property, you will have your opportunity soon. So far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to submit to the will of the House, but I do not want them to vote ignorantly. I want to call their attention to the fact that when they do that there will be claims amounting to more than $500,000,000 pressed upon this committee at the next session of Congress. Heretofore we have stood behind the proposition that we would appropriate only for navigation. It is proposed now to break down that wall and appropriate to protect private property. You can take the responsibility, but you must not blame the Rivers and Harbors Committee. We have stood against these demands. If the Members of the House now want to depart from that policy, it is their privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] is correct, and if I have offered amendments to strike out $586,000 that ought to have been stricken from this bill in face of the committee's opposition against striking it out, then I have certainly tried to perform a service for the people, if those items are vicious, as I believe them to be. Among the items is one for a stream that is dry eight months in the year, and is so shown by the engineers' reports. The sum of $44,000 will go into that stream, and the committee refused to strike it out. The sum of $733,000 will also go into a stream less than 100 miles long, the Oklawaha, which, it is explained, will then help float oranges down from a little place in Florida, although the stream is now paralleled by a railroad. I can not go into the details as to the objections against all these items, but I desire to show how unfair the gentleman's statement is of my position. I did say that, in my judgment, $5,000,000 ought to be stricken from the appropriation for the Ohio River, because only 957,000 tons went through Lock 37 in one year, according to the report; and if you will examine the figures you will find that only 157,000 tons went through that lock aside from the coal which would go down the river, anyway, even if delayed. All the rest of the river traffic went down the river without going through the canal, as it had done for years. If you will compute the cost of the lockage of freight that went down through this system of Ohio River locks on which it is proposed to expend $63,000,000, you will find that the cost to the Government was $23 for every ton, after deducting railway freight to carry the coal. I have shown by freight statistics filed in yesterday's RECORD that on the Missouri River only 6,000 tons of freight was shipped to and from St. Louis, the principal port in 1906, according to the figures which you will find on page 3762 of the RECORD; and yet you have appropriated $2,000,000 for that river in this bill, and $18,000,000 has been spent for improvements in the past. I say it is unreasonable to do this in view of the slight traffic on the Missouri. On the upper Mississippi less than 400,000 tons of traffic is carried annually, according to the engineers' report, and you have appropriated $1,500,000 for the upper Mississippi. On the lower Mississippi you have appropriated in this bill the greatest amount ever spent in one year—$7,000,000; and all these vast sums of money are subject to the same objection that was urged against the $586,000 items.

The CHAIRMAN. All time on this paragraph has expired. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That in the preparation of projects under this and subsequent river and harbor acts, unless otherwise expressed, the channel depths referred to shall be understood to signify the depth at mean lower low water in tidal waters and the mean depth during the month of lowest water in the navigation season in rivers and nontidal channels, and the channel dimensions specified shall be understood to admit of such increase at the entrances, bends, sidings, and turning places as may be necessary to allow of the free movement of boats.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the period after the word "boats," page 65, line 13, insert a semicolon, and add:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriation provided for in this bill shall be expended for any purpose except the maintenance of the present river and harbor projects."

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries $43,289,004. I have offered this amendment to cut out everything in it except the maintenance items, which amount to $4,061,000, because I do not think we should continue to pour out these millions of the people's money without knowing definitely what we are going to accomplish by it. We appropriated a half million dollars for the purpose of making experiments in shallow water and river navigation. We have had a commission working on that for four years. We have no report from that commission yet. That money was appropriated and that commission put to work to find if any craft could be devised that could carry freight on our inland waters in competition with the railroads. This was done by us because it was obvious that the character of craft we have could not. The failure of the Erie Canal in New York State, which is a 7-foot lock canal, proved conclusively that a 7-foot lock canal could not do business against the railroads. The fact that the Ohio River is carrying a much smaller proportion of the freight of that territory each year, and even a smaller tonnage each year, proves that our present mode of carrying freight on that river is a failure. We are attempting to change the character of that river to fit our mode of transportation instead of adjusting our mode of transportation to fit the river. The fact that the Mississippi carries practically none of the freight of that territory, but that the railroads carry it, proves conclusively that our present mode of transportation facilities is a failure for that kind of river. Then, why continue to waste millions wrung from the struggling masses, coined from the sweat of the toilers, on these projects when we do not know that any benefit will come to the people as a whole?

Mr. Chairman, the Erie, a 7-foot lock canal, has failed. They are deepening it at an enormous cost, hoping that a deeper canal will do what a 7-foot canal could not do. The Ohio, an open river, has failed because they could not navigate it all the year round, and we are putting locks in it, at the enormous cost of $63,000,000, hoping that when we have navigation all the year round the commerce will come back to it. The Mississippi has failed, and we are spending millions and millions on it, not for the purpose of getting the commerce back on it, but for the purpose of protecting by levees the surrounding valuable lands from the devastating floods, and we misrepresent our other little rivers and canals scattered over the country in order to get some of these millions spent in our respective territories and in the hope that the few organizations benefited by this distributed fund will keep us elected to office and the multitudes will not see the farce and fraud we are practicing on them.

Show up one of these electioneering projects, and the individual responsible for it comes to its rescue not with facts, but in an effort to conceal the facts. He comes with an air of superior knowledge and deluges you with resounding and nebulous phrases. We had an exhibition of that the other day, when I gave some facts as shown by the engineers' reports about the Trinity and the Brazos Rivers, in my own State and in my own district. I used these rivers as an example of the hundreds in this bill. The gentleman from the present head of navigation on the Brazos says he is going to move navigation up to Granbury. That is only halfway from Waco to Young County, where the river rises. He will certainly not stop there when he gets thoroughly into the race for United States Senator. His longed-for district will then reach to the New Mexico line. He has the campaign head of navigation as far up the river now as his district goes, and when his district is extended to the State boundary line he certainly ought to take navigation with him as far as he goes.

He says:

Let me tell him something about the Brazos River that he seems never to have learned, either from tradition or history. The Brazos River rises in the lower part of New Mexico and flows 900 miles across the great State of Texas into the Gulf of Mexico.

It is true that I have not learned from tradition, history, nor from travel that the Brazos River rises in New Mexico. I have not learned it from the senatorial aspirant from the present head of navigation on the Brazos River, either. Look at this map which I have had brought in here to show the House. The Brazos River rises in Young County, about 250 miles from the New Mexico line. The gentleman got within 250 miles of the truth in his effort to teach me. He must get nearer the truth than that when he undertakes to teach me. I have not gall enough to undertake to talk about a thing I know nothing of. I never presume to teach others about things I know nothing of myself, and when I talk I know what I am talking about. I am never satisfied with guessing at things, and I am not satisfied with getting within 250 miles of the truth.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Is not that a post-office map, and would the gentleman believe a statement from that map as against the statement of his colleague? [Laughter.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. I asked the gentleman if it was not the Brazos River that ran by Lubbock, and he pulled the cork plumb under. "Oh, yes," he said, "Lubbock is nearly a thousand miles from its mouth." No water at all runs by Lubbock. It is on the plains of Texas, and no river nor stream of any kind runs across the plains. The gentleman reminds me of a partner I had in a school debate when I was a boy. He was a fluent talker, using big words and terms that he had picked up, but knew nothing about their meaning. I prepared some facts and figures, and gave them to him to use in his argument; but he said he did not want them, that they bothered him, and he could not talk when he had to be bothered with facts. The gentleman seems endowed with a lurid imagination which has overshadowed, if not wholly obscured, his other faculties. He says:

Col. Jadwine says in his report that when these eight locks and dams are completed the freight rates will be reduced and the farmers of the gentleman's district can ship their cotton from that portion of Texas to the deep-water ports on the Gulf of Mexico for from 50 to 75 cents a bale.

That does not sound like the report of an engineer; and, since the gentleman has not produced the report, I shall place that statement in the same category with his other statements.

He says, again, speaking of me, "He is damaging the great State of Texas and harming himself." I don't think the truth will hurt either Texas or me, though it may cause some well-laid schemes of the gentleman to wither like a green polk stalk in a compost fire. He says, "The Legislature of Texas made enormous land grants for the purpose of developing these waterways."

That is true. The early legislatures of Texas gave away to various and sundry foolish projects the most of our public domain. They gave 4,871,805 acres, worth now $137,154,150, to make these same streams navigable; but they did not make them navigable. The gentleman has been in Congress 18 years, and he has helped to give away on rivers and harbors during that time $386,972,406, and he can not point to-day to a river in Texas that has been made navigable, nor can he point to one any place else. On the contrary, water transportation on rivers and canals has been steadily declining. The upper Mississippi River from 1889 to 1906 lost 85 per cent of her freight. The Missouri and tributaries above St. Louis during the same time lost 50 per cent of their freight, and the lower Mississippi lost 59 per cent of her freight, in spite of the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars on the so-called improvement of these rivers.

There has been appropriated for the Brazos River, beginning before 1902, $2,302,135.65, and for the Trinity $2,229,142.93, and we have no navigation yet, and the engineers' reports say of the Trinity:

There can be no commerce on the river until the project is entirely completed.

How long will it take to complete these projects? We are appropriating about $200,000 per year on the Trinity project, and according to the estimate it will take $8,000,000 to complete it. We will then be 40 years more completing this project that we are hoping will reduce our freight rates. We will all be dead and buried before we get our freight rates reduced if this is the hope. The gentleman may not know these things. He could know them if he would study and think, but the trouble with the gentleman is he talks too much and studies and thinks too little.

The cost of carrying freight on the Erie Canal from 1889 to 1906 averaged 3 mills per ton-mile, and the railroads carried the freight. The canals and rivers have many obstacles to encounter in the ordinary carriage of freight that a railroad does not have, such as drayage to get it in and out from the river. Another thing is the insurance. The Report of the Commissioner of Corporations for 1909 says, on page 359:

As will be more fully discussed in another part of this report, river freight rates are directly affected by the rate of insurance. To attract business to the river route at points where there is rail competition, the freight rate of the steamboat must be sufficiently below the rail rate to allow for the insurance premium. Thus, at Vicksburg, Miss., the river rate on cotton to New Orleans is 75 cents a bale and the insurance is about 20 cents, which aggregates 95 cents per bale as the cost of transportation. The rate by rail from Vicksburg to New Orleans is $1 per bale, leaving the river an apparent advantage of only 5 cents, which is frequently more than offset by the cost of drayage to and from the steamboat line.

A packet line which operates on the Ohio River claims that the insurance rate has practically driven it out of business.

Another line, whose vessels ply the waters of the upper Mississippi, reports that "the cost of insurance on many articles of merchandise is more than the cost of carrying the freight from St. Louis to St. Paul."

One vessel owner estimates that the insurance on vessels and cargoes affected his business to the extent of 33⅓ per cent.

Another disadvantage which river transportation has to contend against is the distance traveled by craft following the meanderings of a river. Take the two Texas projects we have been talking about. It is 426 miles from Waco to the Gulf following the Brazos River, and only 200 miles by rail. It is 512 miles along the Trinity from Dallas to the Gulf and about 240 miles by rail. The actual cost of the railroads for carrying freight is about 7 mills per ton-mile, and the actual cost on the Erie Canal was 3 mills per ton-mile. If the cost on the Trinity should be the same as the cost on the Erie Canal—assuming, of course, that the Trinity project is ever finished—the cost of carrying a ton of freight on it from Dallas to the Gulf would be 1,536 mills, three times 512, the number of miles by the river. The cost by rail would be 1,686 mills, or seven times 240, the number of miles by rail. The figures on the cost of the different modes of transportation are from the engineers' report and the Commissioner of Corporations.

The gentleman from the head of navigation on the Brazos evidently does not know that the Erie Canal of New York, a 7-foot lock canal, has failed completely as a competitor of the railroad and has been abandoned by the State of New York as a 7-foot project. If he knew that he certainly would not have the gall to contend on the floor of this House that we ought to spend millions of dollars trying a 6-foot canal on the Brazos when he says they will only have water enough to operate for six months in the year. He prates about reducing the freight rates. We have State and Interstate Commerce commissions whose duty it is under the law to make the freight rates reasonable—that is, as low as they can be made. Nobody advocates confiscating the railroad property. You may state that water competition will make them reduce the rates at competing points below the rate fixed by the commissions as reasonable. If that be true, the rate at the competing points will be below what is reasonable or the rate at noncompeting points be above what is reasonable, and your argument amounts to a statement that the commissions are not and will not do their duty. You have been claiming that the commissions could not get at the facts, but we have sought to remedy that by putting hundreds of men in the field to make physical valuations of the railroads in order that the Interstate Commerce Commission may have the information on which to base the rate.

Should water competition reduce the rate at the competitive points below the actual cost of transportation by rail, the railroads would have to make up that loss by making the rate higher than reasonable at the interior points, and the result would be that you have saddled the burdens on the interior of developing your water competition for the benefit of competitive points and also the burden of making up the loss to the railroads which they suffer because of having to reduce their rates below cost at the competitive points. That might appeal to the greed and avarice of the competitive points. It might appeal to a Congressman who wanted to favor some locality at the expense of the general public, but it would not appeal to a fair-minded patriot who saw and understood, and it would not appeal to the people at interior points who would be forced to bear this double burden of constructing projects at immense cost in order to raise their own freight rates. The argument that you are intending to develop water competition on these intermittent streams for the purpose of reducing general freight rates is the merest drivel, and the public ought not longer to be bunkoed by such obviously fraudulent claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee limited debate to 10 minutes, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, if I could be granted the 5 minutes now I would not take it up later, and if I am not granted it now I shall have to take it up later. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. GILMORE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] a few moments ago stated that the commerce on the Missouri River last year was 5,000 tons.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. No; the gentleman would not yield to me.

Mr. FREAR. I just want to correct the gentleman in his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, this is the only time that I have taken during the consideration of this bill, and I can not yield. I do not know where the gentleman got his figures, but he got them some place, I presume.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? He has stated them incorrectly.

Mr. BOOHER. No; I have the figures of the commerce on the Missouri River for the last year, and it is astonishing that if the gentleman was hunting for the facts in the case he did not go to the people who could give him the information, and give it to him correctly. The Missouri River improvement is divided into what is called three reaches. The first reach is from St. Louis to Kansas City. The commerce carried on the river from St. Louis to Kansas City was 185,110 tons, with a valuation of $3,000,000. The tonnage from Kansas City to Sioux City, the second reach of the river, was 64,489 tons, the value not given. From Sioux City to Fort Benton, the third reach of the river, the tonnage carried was 15,823 tons, with a total valuation of $600,390, making a total tonnage on the Missouri River from its mouth to Fort Benton of 265,422 tons, with a valuation to the two points mentioned of $3,750,369.

I want to indorse the statement made the other day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] when he said that if there was not a ton of freight shipped upon any of these rivers, yet he was in favor of improving them, and so am I. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] one of these days, if he comes to Congress long enough, will be of the same opinion that the vast majority of the Representatives of this House are to-day.

What effect does the improvement of these rivers have on freight rates? Let me read a statement that I received from the Interstate Commerce Commission showing the effect the establishment of barge lines on the great rivers in this country has upon railroad transportation. I heard so much in this debate that I called up the commission to find out whether it was true that where there was a barge line to be put on the Mississippi River the railroads had applied to the commission for permission to disregard the long-and-short-haul clause in hauling shipments of lumber. Here is the answer I got:

Because a barge line has been or is about to be placed in commission on the Mississippi River between Vicksburg and St. Louis, the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad has asked permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission to disregard the long-and-short-haul clause in hauling shipments of lumber.

Yet the gentleman from Wisconsin would take away every dollar to improve the Mississippi River. I can not imagine why he would do so.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to let me explain?

Mr. BOOHER. No; the gentleman has occupied three or four days explaining, and he has not done it yet, and never can explain. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Yes, I can. I have the records.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, he wants to destroy the commerce of the Ohio River. He would take the commerce away from that great river that supplies the West with coal and compel us to pay double for every ton of coal that we burn every winter, because it is floated down the Ohio River. That could be in the interest of but one class of corporations, one class of people in the world, and that is in the interests of the great railroads of the country and railroad transportation. [Applause.] Oh, yes; destroy water competition, destroy all the transportation upon all of the canals and the rivers of the country and see where the freight rates of this country will go. The gentleman's constituents might be called upon to pay a part of it. It might be possible that up there in a country where there is no river and where he never saw one large enough to swim a sunfish that would do. Perhaps he is opposed to this because he does not like water. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Oh, I am a Republican, not a Democrat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRYAN, page 65, between lines 13 and 14, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"That $100,000 be appropriated for the construction and operation of two survey boats to be used by the United States Coast Survey in surveying and charting the waters of the coast of Alaska."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order for three minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Very well.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition that, according to a resolution I have just received from the Seattle Commercial Club, has been presented here four or five times already. The difference in the way I now present it and the unfortunate way it has been presented before is that at least I have gotten it before Congress while a large majority of the Members are in attendance, pending consideration of the Panama Canal tolls matter, and while others have been energetic and have been doing all they could, and are entitled to no criticism, at the same time Congress has not realized that it is necessary and essential to do something for the improvement of that coast line there off Alaska, so that boats, as they go to and fro from the property investments of the United States Government in Alaska, be not wrecked upon uncharted rocks, and that some kind of protection be given for navigation, and that loss of life and property be prevented there off the coast of Alaska. The Government owns Alaska, it owns the coal, the gold, the copper, the timber, the lands, the harbors, and the vast majority of all the tremendous resources of Alaska. The Government is soon to own a splendid railroad, worth $36,000,000, in Alaska, and it ought to chart the waters of Alaska to make navigation safe from the narrow viewpoint of ownership if for no other reason. Too often are ships wrecked on the coast of that wonderful and valuable land. Why are not the people of Alaska entitled to have their coasts charted and surveyed? There is no reason. Yet if the Atlantic coast had as slight attention along this line as is given to Alaska, the people of the Atlantic coast would send a protest in here to Congress that would have to be heeded. They would get riotously out of order pretty quick.

I know my amendment is not in order. It refers neither to rivers or harbors, and the work referred to is not to be done by the War Department, but I am going to continue to make demands for this survey and for adequate appropriations to chart the coast waters of Alaska. I shall go before the committee and shall offer the amendments here on the floor, whether I am in order or not. To be frank, a man ought to get out of order when he refers to the delay Congress has made in recognizing Alaska along this line. I wish I had more time, Mr. Chairman. I will ask, however, that I may be permitted to extend, as a part of my remarks, the resolutions and splendid presentation of this case which I have just yesterday received from the commercial club of the city of Seattle.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEATTLE COMMERCIAL CLUB.

MARCH 3, 1914.

Whereas the Seattle Commercial Club has already gone on record as advocating the plan of immediately sweeping the rocky channel of the coast of Alaska to discover and locate uncharted obstructions to navigation; and

Whereas Congress is asked to appropriate money for a number of new survey boats to satisfactorily and completely chart the waters of the Alaska coast.

Five times Congress has been asked to make these appropriations. Four times the request has been ignored. Some action by Congress is expected this year. It would be well to consider the facts in the situation and have them properly placed before Congress so that whatever action is taken it may be taken intelligently.

The rocky formation of the coast line and the great depth of water in most of the channels and approaches, together with numerous underwater peaks of hills, projecting upward sometimes nearly to the surface without showing above, makes it necessary that the position of these underwater peaks be accurately determined and charted for safety to navigation.

The old-time and usual method of learning the depth of water has been to attach a sinker to a long line and, by lowering the sinker to the bottom of the water, determine the depth by measuring the distance from top of the water to bottom. This method only discloses the depth at the point where the measurement is taken, which may be within 50 feet of the perpendicular side of a rocky peak extending upward to within a few feet of the surface of the water, and yet not be discernible, although it be a most dangerous menace to the safety of ships navigating the sea in that vicinity. All such underwater peaks can be discovered by drawing a long line at a graduated depth below the surface of the water along the channels and approaches frequented by shipping, say, 40 feet deep at low water.

The nature of this service is such that a small wire cable, probably one-half inch in diameter and 1 or more miles in length, suspended from buoys or small boats with one or two occupants in each would seem to be most suitable.

Drawn through the channels and along the routes frequented by shipping, all obstructions rising near enough to the surface of the water would be discovered and promptly marked by buoys placed in the boats for the purpose, and the continuation of the search would be kept up without delay, thus making it possible to cover a space 20 to 50 square miles daily in ordinary summer weather.

The class of shipping best adapted to this service is the 75 to 100 foot power fishing craft, because their power is not sufficient to break the cable if obstructions are met suddenly; they can proceed at a speed of 3 to 5 miles per hour, which is ample; they can carry all the boats and men required to perform the service efficiently under the supervision of officers of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, or naval officers.

They can easily cover 500 square miles of ocean service monthly, or 3,000 square miles per season of six months yearly; five outfits of two power craft to each could be working at once, making it possible to survey 15,000 square miles of surface waters of the coast yearly for less expense to the Nation than it would cost to build two specially designed crafts which might, after all, be poorly adapted to the purpose.

The cost for charter of suitable boats and crews would be less than $3,000 per month for each craft, or $18,000 for six months' service of each vessel and crew; 10 vessels (5 outfits) would cost the Nation less than $180,000 for the 3,000 square miles of estimated area of survey.

When the survey for the location of all undiscovered projections into the path of navigation is completed and their position discovered and marked, the hydrographic officer can complete the service by placing the positions on the charts accurately. Any appropriations for the purpose exceeding in amount the above-named estimates are excessive, since there is plenty of material, both vessels and men, at present available for the purpose: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a letter embodying the terms of this communication be forwarded to Members of Congress from this coast.

SEATTLE COMMERCIAL CLUB,
Seattle, March 17, 1914.

Whereas the Bureau of the United States Coast Survey have now a device or contrivance for such work, and same is on exhibit at their offices in Washington, D. C.,

We would recommend that this club should approve of such action as is outlined in this resolution, and that the secretary of the Seattle Commercial Club be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution, including the report of this committee, to the Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, at Washington, D. C., and to the Oregon and Washington congressional delegations, urging them to adopt this method of procedure, so that work may commence without unnecessary delay, not waiting to build special vessels that may have to be laid up in a "boneyard" after this special service or survey is completed.

Respectfully submitted.

M. J. CARKEEK (Chairman),
D. THOMAS DAVIES,
J. E. CRONIN,
JOS. A. SLOANE,
W. J. RANKIN,
River and Harbor Committee.

Unanimously passed by the Seattle Commercial Club in regular session Tuesday evening, March 17, 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909, providing that all tugboats using the Potomac River, where the same is spanned by the new railway and new highway bridges, be equipped with devices for lowering their smokestacks, is hereby amended to include "power boats," meaning any boat, vessel, or craft propelled by machinery, whether the machinery be only principal or auxiliary power of propulsion; and the provisions and requirements of the said act are hereby made applicable to "power boats" as herein defined.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon the section. If the gentleman desires to explain it for a moment, I will reserve the point of order. I refer to section 8.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the gentleman simply want an explanation of the paragraph; is that the idea?

Mr. MANN. With my present information I shall make the point of order, but I do not profess to be very well acquainted with the facts.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can give no more information than is given in the report which is printed and submitted to the House.

Mr. MANN. How does the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have authority to take jurisdiction of a matter of this kind, the law having come out of a bill reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, I will say to the gentleman that it has been the custom of our committee to take jurisdiction of matters similar to this. I grant the gentleman that the Committee on Interstate Commerce has also jurisdiction of such matters, but we have been doing the same thing from time to time by placing provisions in the river and harbor bill which would perhaps not fall strictly under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but, like this, were matters pertaining to navigation.

Mr. MANN. There was a bitter fight over this matter when it was before the House on the bill which became the law, a bitter controversy relating to the navigation of the Potomac River. I do not remember the merits of the particular side, although that committee reported the bill which became a law. Now, I do not know, and I ask the gentleman if he does know, whether this reopens that fight in any way, or whether the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has given any attention to this matter except to incorporate the section suggested, I suppose, by some very efficient Government official?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It only extends the law now applicable to tugboats on the Potomac so as to embrace power boats. That is all.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think with the knowledge I have I will make the point or order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. There is no last word and there will not be any last words.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BEALL of Texas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 75. An act for the relief of Theresa A. Murray; and

S. 4943. An act to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to define and establish anchorage grounds for vessels in harbors, rivers, bays, and other navigable waters of the United States whenever it is manifest to the said Secretary that the maritime or commercial interests of the United States require such anchorage grounds for safe navigation and the establishment of such anchorage grounds shall have been remommended by the Chief of Engineers, and to adopt suitable rules and regulations in relation thereto; and such rules and regulations shall be enforced by the Revenue-Cutter Service under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That at ports or places where there is no revenue cutter available such rules and regulations may be enforced by the Chief of Engineers under the direction of the Secretary of War. In the event of the violation of any such rules and regulations by the owner, master, or person in charge of any vessel, such owner, master, or person in charge of such vessel shall be liable to a penalty of $100; and the said vessel may be holden for the payment of such penalty, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily by libel for the recovery of the same in any United States district court for the district within which such vessel may be and in the name of the officer designated by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon the section, and I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is familiar with existing regulations on this subject. Here is a proposition to permit the Secretary of War to establish anchorage grounds in the various ports and harbors. Only recently we passed a bill to permit the Secretary of Commerce to exercise that jurisdiction.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I know there was a bill of that kind passed through the House, but I do not think it has yet passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I did not say it had.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think it is still pending there.

Mr. MANN. I said we had passed it. Here one day the House is asked to pass a bill, by unanimous consent, to permit the Secretary of Commerce to establish anchorage grounds, and the next day the House is asked to pass a bill, by unanimous consent, to allow the Secretary of War to establish anchorage grounds. In view of the fact the House has passed the other bill with reference to a matter over which the Secretary of Commerce has proper jurisdiction, unless the gentleman has very cogent reasons, I shall make the point of order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I do not think the provision subject to a point of order. It has been the custom——

Mr. MANN. Then I make the point of order, and let us thrash it out.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I say it has been the custom of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to insert just such provisions in rivers and harbors bills. It has been done time and time again. We provided for the harbor of New York in that way, and in the last bill there were two or three similar provisions providing for the establishment of anchorage grounds in other sections of the country. The Secretary of War ought to have this power. It is his province to make improvements in rivers and harbors, and he ought also to have the authority to establish anchorage grounds. At the same time, I think it is proper to give to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is equipped for the purpose, power to enforce the provisions. I think also that anyone who is entirely familiar with the matter will agree that the Secretary of Commerce should not have the enforcement of the law regarding anchorage grounds. He is not equipped for the work as is the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend from Florida, for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration, I think has forgotten the fact that in the Department of Commerce is the Bureau of Navigation, not in the Department of War.

The only jurisdiction that the War Department has over rivers and harbors is in reference to the improvement of them under the Engineer Corps of the Army, and the only jurisdiction which this committee has to bring before this House a privileged bill is in reference to the improvement in rivers and harbors. Under the existing law the Secretary of Commerce already has authority to establish anchorage grounds at the port of New York and at the port of Chicago. Recently we passed a bill to authorize him to establish anchorage grounds at any place. Those anchorage grounds are not connected with the making of improvements of the harbors. They come after the improvement is completed. Here is a provision in this bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to do certain things in connection with the Revenue-Cutter Service, a matter wholly outside of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Again, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, and it is the only thing I intend to say further in reference to the provision, that the Secretary of War, having the authority to improve harbors and rivers, is better qualified, through the engineers, in my judgment, to establish and lay out anchorage grounds than anyone else.

The CHAIRMAN. It is purely a question of the jurisdiction of the committee. The fact that they may have heretofore incorporated provisions in the bill that might have been challenged on the ground of jurisdiction would hardly be an argument in favor of the provision. In the opinion of the Chair, this provision is not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, this closes the reading of the bill, but there is a paragraph that was passed over by unanimous consent, the one for the improvement of Beverly Harbor, and I ask to return to that provision now.

The CHAIRMAN. What paragraph is that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is on page 2 of the bill, and relates to Beverly Harbor, to which I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the paragraph was not read before. It will have to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Beverly, Mass., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 220, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, as modified in the report in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 8, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $61,500: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $61,500, exclusive of the amount herein appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "session," in line 21, page 2, and including the word "appropriated," in line 26, and insert in lieu thereof "$123,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is recognized.

[Mr. LINTHICUM addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 59 of the bill in order to make a slight correction. In line 3 I move to strike out the words "at and below the mouth of the Black River."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 59, line 3, by striking out the words "at and below the mouth of the Black River."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 55 and offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] asks unanimous consent to offer the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 55, between lines 20 and 21, insert a new paragraph, as follows: "Schuylkill River, from the Delaware River to South Street Bridge, with the view of dredging to a depth of 35 feet, including consideration of any proposition for cooperation on the part of local or State interests."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not demand any.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Collier amendment, an amendment providing $125,000 for improving the Mississippi River at Vicksburg.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the other amendments? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 29, between lines 20 and 21, by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

"Improving harbor at Vicksburg, Miss., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 667, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions therein stated, $125,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will withdraw the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker, and ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] withdraws the point of no quorum and asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-three Members have arisen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 50 and the noes are 153. Fifty being a sufficient number, the yeas and nays are ordered. The Clerk will call the roll, and those in favor of the Collier amendment will vote "yea"; those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 195, nays 164, answered "present" 7, not voting 66, as follows:

So the Collier amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. DUPRÉ with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.

Mr. GLASS with Mr. FORDNEY.

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. SWITZER.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas with Mr. HINEBAUGH.

Mr. JACOWAY with Mr. MONDELL.

Mr. PATTEN of New York with Mr. SELLS.

Mr. MCCLELLAN with Mr. KAHN.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "present."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening?

Mr. STANLEY. I was in the doorway, listening.

The SPEAKER. That is a close shave. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANLEY. I vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike from the bill each and every item providing in whole or in part for the construction or purchase of any part or segment of the proposed intercoastal waterway from Boston to the Rio Grande River.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-two gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Two hundred and forty-three gentlemen have arisen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 42 and the noes are 243.

Accordingly, one-fifth not voting in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-one Members have voted in favor of ordering the yeas and nays. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it requires one-fifth of those present to order the yeas and nays, and that the count just made on the former motion shows that 41 Members are not one-fifth of those present.

The SPEAKER. Forty-one are not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused, and the bill is passed. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13612) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 746. An act for the relief of Capt. Frank Parker; and

S. J. Res. 114. Joint resolution for the appointment of a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 75. An act for the relief of Theresa A. Murray; to the Committee on Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JACOWAY, for one day, on account of illness.

ORDER OF DEBATE ON THE PANAMA CANAL TOLLS BILL.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 437 (H. Rept. 464).

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of House bill 14385; that said bill shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and the same shall be the continuing order of the House until disposed of; that there shall be not exceeding 20 hours' general debate on the bill, to be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the bill, 10 hours of such time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], 5 hours to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND], 4 hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], and 1 hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY]. At the conclusion of such general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit: Provided, That all Members speaking upon said bill shall have the right to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD and that all Members of the House shall have the right to print remarks upon the bill during not exceeding five legislative days."

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have some understanding with the gentlemen on the other side as to the time that we shall allow for debate on the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, there has been great demand upon this side of the House for time upon this rule; more than could be accommodated in the usual way. If the gentleman will prefer a request for unanimous consent for additional time, I think we may be able to agree.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, after consulting with a good many of the Members, I believe we ought to allow 3 hours' debate on this rule, inasmuch as we have allowed 20 hours on the bill coming up for consideration after action on the rule; one hour and a half of the time for debate on that rule to be controlled by myself and the other hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that such be the agreement and the order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that debate on this rule run not longer than three hours, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Kansas. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. And I give notice that at the end of the three hours I shall move the previous question.

Mr. HAY. That it be considered as ordered.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why not put that in the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I will do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas gives notice that at the end of three hours he will move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have some understanding with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] regarding an allotment of time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, if the request preferred by the gentleman from Texas is agreed to, I will yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] out of the hour and a half granted to me.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. HARRISON. Reserving the right to object, I will ask if the Democrats who are opposed to the rule are to have any time from the gentleman?

Mr. HENRY. Four hours.

Mr. HARRISON. I am talking about the rule, now. I understood that 40 minutes of the time on the other side would be given over to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. How much time will the Democrats who may be opposed to the rule be given?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will state that I have had only one request from the Democratic side of the House for time, and I think I shall be able to accommodate the gentleman making that request.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not think there are any Democrats opposing the rule, anyway.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that perhaps we had better have a little further understanding as to what is to be the program, so that we will not get into a wrangle about it. Under the rules of the House, if this consent should be granted and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] should yield time to some one in the House for the purpose of offering an amendment to the rule, that would be in order.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, my request is that the three hours shall be devoted to debate and debate only, and that it shall be agreed at the end of that time I shall move the previous question. That is the agreement and understanding that I am proposing.

Mr. MANN. Of course, that is not the request which the gentleman made before.

Mr. HENRY. I think the gentleman will find that it was.

Mr. MANN. The request was that there should be three hours' debate; but any Member of the House who obtains the floor in his own right is entitled to offer an amendment to the pending proposition, as the gentleman well knows. Now, I do not think we ought to get into a wrangle about it.

Mr. HENRY. I think not, and I do not think we will, because I believe the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], and myself can agree about the matter, so as to give the House the benefit of three hours' debate on the rule.

Mr. MANN. I would not be willing to consent to an agreement which gave the House no opportunity to vote as to whether it would entertain an amendment to the rule. I take it from the gentleman's request that what he is figuring upon is that if no amendment is offered during the three hours, then he will test the sense of the House on the question of an amendment by a vote upon the previous question.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman takes me exactly as I intended him to take me.

Mr. MANN. Well, while it goes pretty hard with me to agree at all under these circumstances, and while I think we who are opposed to the rule and the tolls bill lose an advantage, still in view of the statements which have been made to me by gentlemen on this side of the House, who are members of the Rules Committee, I shall not interpose an objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this rule be limited to three hours.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he intends to force a vote on this rule to-night.

Mr. HENRY. That depends upon circumstances. The gentleman from Texas will try to be fair with all Members of the House.

Mr. OGLESBY. I shall not object.

Mr. HENRY. Let me say that if the House is willing to stay I am willing to stay, but I do not want to commit myself on that proposition now, and the gentleman from New York will not ask me to do so.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not want to object, and I do not want to be bound by this rule to sit through the night.

Mr. HULINGS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. HULINGS. To reserve the right to object. I would like to present to this House some observations of my own about this free-toll question. I went to gentlemen who have charge of the time, and I find that they have no time for me. I then went to some of these managers here, and was told that I could have 10 minutes of the time devoted to the discussion of the rule, out of which time everybody was expected to holler about tolls and not much about the rule. But that gave me 10 minutes, which satisfied me, and I would like to understand now from the people who have control of this matter whether I get a show.

Mr. HENRY. Let me say to the gentleman that I have discovered only two or three sides of this question. If there is another side we would like for the gentleman to have some time.

Mr. HULINGS. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Let me say to my friend that 10 minutes will be given him from the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HULINGS. I make no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this resolution be limited to three hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] agrees to yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] agrees to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. MANN. Let us see, Mr. Speaker, if that is the request. If I understand it, it is that the gentleman from Texas shall have an hour and a half on this resolution and the gentleman from Kansas an hour and a half. If at the end of that time the previous question is moved and not carried, I do not understand that that stops any further consideration of the rule.

Mr. HENRY. If the previous question is not moved, or if it is voted down, the resolution will be open to amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. And to further debate.

Mr. HENRY. Of course.

The SPEAKER. We want a fair understanding about this matter to save wrangling hereafter. Does the gentleman from Texas incorporate in his request for unanimous consent that there shall be no amendment offered during the three hours?

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman from Kansas has said that he would not yield time for that purpose.

Mr. HENRY. That is the understanding, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the rule is plain and speaks for itself. It provides for immediate consideration of the bill reported to the House for the purpose of repealing the exemption of coastwise ships passing through the Panama Canal from the payment of tolls. The rule allows 20 hours for debate, and at the end of that time it provides that automatically the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and that the House shall immediately vote on the bill, with but one motion to recommit allowed under the terms of the special rule.

It allows liberal debate. The proposition in the Sims bill is a simple one. It is whether there shall be a repeal or no repeal. That is the sole issue. No amendment is appropriate or necessary.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there are numerous gentlemen who desire to address the House upon this measure, it is not improper that I should depart from the strict discussion of the rule and discuss somewhat the issues involved in the main controversy. We are met with the proposition that we are about to abrogate one of the demands of the Baltimore platform. I am ready to meet that proposition. There is no gentleman who believes in obedience to the mandate of his party more than I do. Let me say to-day that when the question of passing upon the amendment was up in the House as to whether or not we should have free tolls through the Panama Canal for the benefit of our coastwise trade, a majority of the Democratic Members voted against such exemption. Here is an analysis of that vote, and there were 72 Democrats who voted in favor of the exemption and 94 Democrats voted against it, a majority of 22 on the Democratic side of the House voted against exempting these ships. I do not say these things for the purpose of arousing partisanship to-day, because this question rises far above partisan politics. It involves the international honor of this country, and I am ready to take my place with the Democratic administration and aid in the correction of the blunder. [Applause.]

The exemption from tolls is a plain violation of a treaty and a contract made with England and other countries. A few lines from the treaty state the case so plainly that it can not be controverted. It needs no argument if the English language means anything. Long prior to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty other nations of the earth were planning to construct a canal across that Isthmus. After the Spanish-American War was over and our country was victorious, the question of constructing a canal there was revived and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was substantially the same as the Clayton-Bulwer contract, was agreed to and took the place of our former obligation. Let me read the language embodied in the treaty found in article 3, section 1. It is this:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

That was our international contract, not only with England but it is our agreement in a number of other treaties with South American and Central American countries. In my judgment, the world understood us to mean that there should be no exemption in favor of our own ships passing through that canal. Certainly, if we exempt our ships from the payment of tolls, carrying perhaps half the commerce that will pass through the canal, we discriminate against the commerce and ships of all other countries. Nothing could be clearer to my mind. But gentlemen take the position that we built the canal and that it is ours, and that we are entitled to its use free for the benefit of our ships in the face of the treaty. For one I have brought myself to the deliberate conclusion, facing a grave crisis, that we are violating the plighted faith of our Republic. Since the President has come and asked for aid, I shall follow him, as great as any President occupying the White House since the days of Andrew Jackson. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there are other questions that I would like to refer to at length, but shall not take up the time properly belonging to others. I do wish, however, to discuss two or three points in order to develop the issues involved. Gentlemen say that our coastwise trade is entitled to go through this canal free. I say that when we wrote that amendment in the act, we provided for giving a subsidy to a monopoly, to a Shipping Trust, and we did not lift a single burden from the backs of the American people. [Applause.] We were not protecting our people; we were granting a gratuity to a monopoly, pure and simple. Let me read a few lines from a report, not yet generally circulated, which has just been issued by a committee engaged for months in investigating this question as to who are the beneficiaries of this subsidy and this gratuity. This is from the report that has recently been made by the committee appointed to investigate the Shipping Trust, and they have performed a great service for the American people in doing this work. Here is one of the statements:

OUR ATLANTIC AND GULF COASTWISE TRADE.

On this leading water highway of American commerce practically all the large, regular steamship lines are either controlled by railroads or are subsidiaries of one of two large shipping consolidations—the Eastern Steamship Corporation and the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines. Exclusive of some very small and purely local lines, 28 lines, representing 235 steamers with a total of 549,821 gross tons, handle practically all of the traffic along the entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts. Of the 235 steamers and 549,821 gross tons referred to, the lines controlled by the railroads represent 54.5 per cent and 61.9 per cent, respectively; the lines of the Eastern Steamship Corporation, 11.3 per cent and 10 per cent; and the lines of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, 18.2 per cent and 22 per cent. In other words, the steamers of the railroad-controlled lines combined with those of the Eastern Steamship Corporation and the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines number 199, or 84.7 per cent of the above-mentioned total for the 28 lines, and represent 516,055 gross tons, or 93.9 per cent of the foregoing total gross tonnage.

Not only do the railroads and the two shipping consolidations dominate over nine-tenths of the tonnage, but it is significant that very few of the principal routes on our entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts are served by more than one regular steamship line.

What does this mean? Simply that these gentlemen who secured this exemption from the payment of tolls are in a combination with the railroads and two steamship companies; that although we have about 2,500 vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, on account of their size a little less than 2,000 will go through the canal, and of those 2,000 going through they are in the clutches of railroads and these two steamship monopolies and trusts. They are affiliated and combined with the Standard Oil Trust, the Steel Trust, the Southern Pacific Railway Co., the New Haven & Hartford Railway Co., the Seacoast Air Line. And here is a list of them printed in a bulletin entitled "Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce and Labor, showing the seagoing vessels of the United States, with official numbers and signal letters, being Part IV of the forty-third annual list of merchant vessels of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1911." It is issued by the Government, showing their ownership, and that they will be the beneficiaries of this bounty. It is estimated that by securing this gift from the Government this combination will put into their pockets $1,000,000 every year. Aye, more than one million; perhaps two millions or two and one-half millions. This will be half the commerce going through the canal. When we built the canal and, according to experts, made it possible to lift the burdens from the backs of the people of more than 25 and 50 per cent saving in freight rates, we did a great thing in behalf of the people. These are the men in combination who will profit by free tolls. They say it is for the benefit of the coastwise trade of America. Let us see whether it is for the benefit of our coastwise trade. Take one of these great ships coming from Hawaii across through the Panama Canal to the Atlantic and Gulf ports, belonging to these gentlemen. They pass through the canal untouched by the charges of toll, and yet a British steamship going through from Vancouver Island, bound for the same port, must pay the tolls. And a ship coming from South American ports, from that part of the world through the canal, must pay the toll. A ship of 10,000 tons must pay $15,000, while this great shipping monopoly and trust passing through and going into our harbors is donated the magnificent sum of $15,000, which it puts down in its pocket and never gives the benefit of that amount to the American people in the reduction of freight rates. Here is the report. Let me read a little further in order that we may see what this diligent committee has ascertained for our benefit and that of the people. In the summary the distinguished gentleman from Missouri makes this statement:

The foregoing chapters discuss the control of regular line services in the most important divisions of this country's domestic commerce. With the exception of the Pacific coast trade proper it was shown that the line traffic is handled by comparatively few companies and that these are largely controlled by railroads and shipping consolidations. Thus, in the entire Atlantic and Gulf coastwise trade, exclusive of all inland waterway and purely local carriers, 28 lines, representing 235 steamers, of 549,821 gross tons, furnish the line service. Of this number of lines 10 are railroad owned and represent 128 steamers of 340,084 gross tons, or 54.5 per cent of the total number of steamers in the trade and 61.9 per cent of the tonnage. Seven lines, operating 71 steamers of 175,971 gross tons in the coastwise trade, belong to the Eastern Steamship Corporation and the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, and represent in the aggregate nearly 30 per cent of the total number of steamers and 32 per cent of the tonnage. Combining the two interests, it appears that the railroads and two Atlantic coast shipping consolidations control nearly 85 per cent of the steamers and nearly 94 per cent of the gross tonnage engaged in the entire Atlantic and Gulf coastwise trade. Attention may be called again to the fact that very few of the routes between any two ports on the entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts are served by more than one line.

There is the report proving the shipping trust and monopoly to receive the benefit by the remission of tolls. And here is the list of ships set out that would pass through the canal. I lay their ownership before this House and the people. It will not be the small shipowners who receive the benefit from the exemption from the charges that should be imposed at that canal, for they will never get through. It will not benefit and build up our merchant marine that should go to the limits of the earth and seek every clime. It will simply be a magnificent gift to this little coterie of shipowners and railroad magnates to put in their pockets more than $1,000,000 every year. And then in order to pay for the operation of the canal and the interest on the money invested this House must go to the people and put a burden on their backs of paying more than a million dollars that should be paid by this shipping trust.

Mr. ADAMSON. Two million dollars.

Mr. HENRY. My friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] says it will amount to $2,000,000 annually, and I have no doubt that he is entirely correct, but I wished to be conservative and to say that while I am a Member of this House, without meaning to disparage or criticize anyone who disagrees with me, I will never give my consent to put money in the pockets of this cruel monopoly and place the burden upon the backs of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It not only violates our contract with England and the balance of the world, but it violates the fundamental faith of the Democratic Party, which has been against subsidies and gratuities during all its existence. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Democratic Party can not afford to make this departure here to-day. If we made a mistake, let us correct it. And the sooner we correct it the better it will be for the entire country. In less than a year from to-day the American people will wonder why the House of Representatives, under any circumstances, ever agreed to put this money in the pockets of that monopoly. They are wondering how it ever passed through this House, and I say to those who vote to stay the hand of these greedy cormorants that within a year the people will be proud of your vote. Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this crisis there is one thing that should thrill the bosoms of us all, that whether it be popular or unpopular there is a man at the White House richly endowed with Jacksonian courage summoning his countrymen to his aid on this occasion in speedily undoing this deplorable international blunder. As he sits there he will not find them wanting in loyal support and undying devotion to his lofty purpose and patriotism as he seeks to avert the crime of further international dishonor. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 25 minutes and reserves the balance of his time. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 50 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the only leg upon which the gentleman from Texas who has just taken his seat stood was that the American ships that are to use the canal free of tolls are owned by the railroads and the trusts. The gentleman from Texas evidently has overlooked the fact that this rule does not provide for a repeal of all of the canal act of 1912, and that act provides that no ships owned by railroads and trusts can pass through that canal at all. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am sorry I can not.

Mr. HENRY. Well, I could answer the gentleman if he would yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Texas is driven into close quarters in attempting to find apologies for the humiliating surrender that this rule seeks to enable this House to make in the shortest time possible. He raises the demagogic cry against the Standard Oil Co., the Steel Corporation, and the Sugar Trust. I remind him that all these are American industries, not English, and that if they violate the law they can not use the canal.

Mr. Speaker, this rule is to expedite the most abject and humiliating surrender ever made by our Government to a foreign power. And the President tells us that, right or wrong, we must do this thing. [Applause.]

This gag rule makes in order the bill to repeal that part of the law for the government of the Panama Canal that exempts our own ships engaged in our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls on our own canal.

The claim is made that this provision of the canal act is unjust to England, for the reason British ships will be required to pay tolls when using the canal, while our own coastwise vessels do not.

Think of that! Why, neither the ships of England, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, or any other country may load at any port of the United States and unload at any other port of the United States. The ships of every country but our own are forbidden to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States. That shipping is done entirely by American ships. This exclusive trade in American shipping is done under our laws, notwithstanding the treaty of 1815. That treaty uses plainer language—leaving nothing to inference in referring to "equal treatment" in the ports of the United States—than is used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in 100 years England has never contended through diplomatic channels that "equal treatment" should be construed so as to deny to American ships the exclusive right of carrying our coastwise trade.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am sorry I can not.

Let me read from the treaty of 1815. In its second article it provides in these words:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's Territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

That is plain English. And yet, under that treaty England has discriminated in favor of her own ships in her coasting trade, and we have excluded England and all other nations from our coastwise trade.

The language of both treaties imposes substantially the same obligations upon the United States with respect to the treatment that it shall give to other nations, in the use of its ports, in the treaty of 1815, and in the use of the Panama Canal in the treaty of 1901. Entire equality of treatment to other nations is provided for in both treaties. The plain provision in the treaty of 1815 for equal treatment did not include our coastwise trade.

It was urged in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) that exempting American coasting vessels from the payment of pilotage charges was a violation of the treaty of 1815 between the United States and Great Britain, the treaty I have just read.

The court, in passing upon the question, said:

Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

That is a clear interpretation of the provision for treatment on equal terms against the new contentions of the President. [Applause.]

Now, let me read from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, which is the treaty now in controversy. I read from article 3, as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The equal treatment of nations under such treaty covenants as are made in the treaty of 1901 has had the interpretation of England for a hundred years that we contend for in the canal treaty to-day—the right of sovereignty in domestic affairs. [Applause.]

Let me read the contention of Secretary Hay, who signed the treaty for the United States when it was submitted to the Senate. He said in a note at that time:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed, it is exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it.

And as to American responsibility he said—

The United States alone, as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the resistance of Great Britain, or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality.

That is the clear construction of a Secretary of State who knew our rights and asserted them.

The American contention we insist upon now is considered sound by ex-President Roosevelt. It is insisted upon by ex-President Taft, who signed the canal act providing for free tolls for our own ships. It was contended for by Secretary Knox and conceded by the office of foreign affairs of His Britannic Majesty's Government in July, 1912, when the canal act was under consideration in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] This principle was rightfully maintained by the House of Representatives with a Democratic majority and by the Senate with a Republican majority two years ago. The soundness of economic principles or of foreign policies has not changed in our country since then.

On August 15, 1912, when Woodrow Wilson was a candidate for President, he said:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports * * * and have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific or down the coast of South America. * * *

One of the bills pending, passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House, provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

The President was right then; he is wrong now. Was he "spreading molasses to catch flies" at that time, or did he believe with two of his predecessors and a majority in both Houses that he was right? Why has he changed his mind? The platform of the Democratic Party upon which he was elected specifically indorses free tolls for American ships.

But the President told us a few days ago that "right or wrong" we must repeal that part of the canal act that exempts our own shipping engaged in our own coastwise trade from the payment of tolls on our own canal, and in a mysterious fashion refers to the "foreign policy" of the administration. He told us that if we do not grant him this request in "ungrudging measure" he will not know what to do in other very important matters.

What are the important matters? What is the foreign policy of the administration? Does the President know? No one else does.

The President does not explain what his diplomatic embarrassment is that makes this surrender necessary. Does he fear the murderer and illiterate bandit, Villa, will break off diplomatic relations with his administration, and in that event he will need the aid of England, or does he ask Congress to aid him in further humiliating the American people by making this abject surrender because England now asks that this be done? Was our ambassador at the Court of St. James, on the 11th of March, speaking for the administration when he said:

He could not say that the United States had constructed the canal for Great Britain, but that it added greatly to the pleasure of building that great work to know that the British would profit most by its use.

Is it to accomplish the purpose set forth in that declaration of the American ambassador to England that we are asked to repeal the law that gives to the American people some advantage in the use of the canal that they have built on their own soil at a cost of $400,000,000? Does anyone in the United States believe we would have spent this or any like amount of money in the construction of the canal if it had been proposed to surrender the control to a foreigfn power, as the President now proposes. [Applause.]

On another occasion in this House Henry Clay reminded Members here that they were not members of the British Parliament. I remind you to-day that you are Members of the American Congress, representing the American people. [Applause.]

I have only referred to the effect the repeal will have upon our rights to control our domestic commerce in the use of our own canal. If no other question were involved, our humiliation will be complete when this repeal has been accomplished; but rising above our rights as a commercial nation to the use of our own canal, on our own soil, in our own country, under our own flag, is the right we are surrendering by this repeal as to our ships of war.

The language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality—

And so forth.

To whom is the canal open on terms of entire equality? To all nations observing these rules. The rules referred to are as follows; I read clauses 2 to 6 of article 3 of the treaty:

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

Who made the rules? The United States, the constructor and owner of the canal.

If the President is correct in his contention, these rules for the use of the canal apply to the United States just as they apply to England and Japan, and if that is the case the canal is of neither commercial or strategic benefit to the United States.

Such a construction is incompatible with our ownership, and it passes understanding how any American can take such a position.

But if we concede the contention of England in regard to our vessels of commerce by the construction we are asked by the President to put upon the treaty by the repeal proposed, we shall commit ourselves forever to the graver, more serious, more humiliating, more un-American interpretation of the treaty giving England and all other nations equal rights with us to use our canal for ships of war in time of war.

If the warships of England or of Japan in a war with us wish to reach our opposite coast they will have an equal right with our ships in the use of the canal for their ships of war, if the construction contended for by the President is correct. In such an event, the lockkeeper of the Panama Canal will be forced to dip the American flag to foreign war vessels as they pass through the canal upon the same terms as our own war vessels.

And if we charge tolls to others, the Oregon, on her way back to the Pacific coast, will have to pay tolls or go around the Horn again.

Every drop of red blood in America protests against the possibility of such a humiliation, but that result is inevitable as to vessels of war if the President is right in his new contention as to vessels of commerce. Both are included in the treaty in the same connection. [Applause.]

It is cowardly to repeal the free-tolls provision of the canal act on the request of a foreign power. This rule and the bill it seeks to make in order should be defeated by this House. By such action we shall maintain a sovereign's control over our domestic affairs; we shall preserve our own respect and command the respect of England and every other country in the world; we shall honor the living and pay tribute to the memory of the dead, who were ready to sacrifice everything but their honor to establish and preserve the Republic; we shall reflect the warm sentiment of the millions of our countrymen in whose veins there is rich, red blood that beats for their own country; and we shall bequeath to posterity a fearless Americanism that will be a priceless heritage to the unborn generations of the future.

The old eagle of the Republic encountered the British lion in heroic battle for a place in the crags in which to maintain its aerie. It used the tawny mane of the lion to line its nest. [Applause.]

Is the young eagle of the Republic stricken with terror when the British lion only growls?

The White House has given a pathetic and humiliating answer. But we shall have from the country, when the country speaks, an answer full of inspiration to every patriotic American who believes that this Republic is sovereign on its own soil. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has used 10 minutes and reserves the remainder.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for the adoption of the resolution now before the House is to be found in the necessity for the modification of existing law, which provides that tolls shall not be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. If the act which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, the act of August 24, 1912, should be amended by repealing such exemption, then this rule now under consideration should be adopted by this House.

It would be well-nigh impossible to secure action by the House, during this session of Congress at least, except by unanimous consent, upon a bill repealing the toll-exemption clause. It is safe to say that such unanimous consent would never be given. Under the pending resolution ample time for debate is allowed. The rule therefore provides that after reasonable debate a bill repealing that provision of existing law which exempts vessels engaged in our coastwise trade from the payment of canal tolls shall be voted on by the House. Those who believe that the tolls-exemption provision of existing law should be repealed insist, first, that such exemption violates both the letter and the spirit of a treaty with a foreign nation; second, that even though such provision did not violate a treaty with a foreign nation there are economic considerations which fully justify a repeal of the law exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of such tolls.

Mr. Speaker, the very premises of those who argue in favor of the free tolls for coastwise vessels are incorrect.

Some of them tell us that the canal is ours to use as we please; that it is built with our money; that it is dug through our territory; that being the property of the American people we can without let or hindrance use it as we see fit. In support of this contention gentlemen are appealing to the patriotism of the people—to a national spirit easily excited, and to an ancient prejudice quickly aroused. The canal is ours. Thank God, the Stars and Stripes are to float over it, and for all time will make known to the world that the greatest work of the kind undertaken since the beginning of time was accomplished by a people whose greatest pride is to live under that flag in peace and to die defending it, if necessary, in time of war.

But, Mr. Speaker, no matter how intense our Americanism or how ardent our patriotism there are certain conditions and stipulations which must in honor be observed in the administration of the canal.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty we were under solemn compact with Great Britain. Until the treaty was abrogated and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty negotiated in place thereof we could not build an isthmian canal at all. We had agreed that neither Government should "ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the ship canal." Under that solemn contract we could not build or after building fortify a canal such as we have now constructed.

We owned no territory in the Isthmus or anywhere near it. Great Britain did. Whether the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was wise or unwise this Nation was a party to it and morally bound by its provisions.

Many of us recall very clearly the circumstances of the signing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901. This Nation has had no greater diplomat in my lifetime than John Hay. He was a great statesman, but preeminently great was he as a diplomat. That treaty was the crowning achievement of a useful and blameless life.

Mr. Speaker, if John Hay were living to-day, what would he say with respect to the contention that the canal is ours to do with as we please, without regard to the rights or interest of any other people of the world? Do you imagine that he would charge President Wilson with "lowering American spirit"? Do you imagine for a moment that diplomat and statesman would countenance the charge that President Wilson is "truckling to England," and such other similar charges as are being leveled at a President who has the nerve to do what he thinks is right?

Oh, no, Mr. Speaker; the entire life and services of that great man answer "No." I imagine Mr. Hay, if living, would remind us of the circumstances which surrounded the signing of the new treaty. I imagine he would very modestly remind us that but for the new treaty we could not construct the canal at all; that the new treaty is by far more favorable to the interest of this Nation than was the old treaty; that Great Britain made important concessions, while we made practically none. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, he would tell us that the words of that treaty—

> There shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise—mean just what they say.

Mr. Hay taught, by his life, the highest, best, and cleanest of all diplomacy. He taught that in dealings between nations it was no more necessary to lie than in dealings between individuals. Having taught that sham and humbuggery and falsehood were not necessary in dealings between nations, it is reasonably safe to assume that he would hold now, if living, that the words of the treaty mean what they say; and if those words do mean what they say, then we can not in honor remit tolls to owners of our own ships unless we treat citizens of Great Britain in the same manner.

Mr. Speaker, let me pause here to remark that it is always bad for the Government to single out any man or class of men for special governmental favor, but it is infinitely worse when in doing this the Government also violates a treaty with a foreign nation. We have no more moral right to remit tolls to the owners of coastwise vessels than we would have to carry freight of these same men free of charge across the Isthmus over our Government railroad.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one other phase of this matter which I can merely touch upon. Some gentlemen tell us that we ought not to violate our party platform. It is urged that the Democratic Members of the House should support the free-toll proposition, because the national platform of the party declares in favor of free tolls for coastwise vessels. Some of our Republican friends in this latter day are eager for us to stand by our own platform. It is somewhat remarkable that the only time our Republican friends have ever been known to indorse any part of a Democratic platform happened to be when we were wrong. [Laughter.] Of course, we ought to stand by our party platform where it is possible to do so consistently. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Yes; where it is possible to do so consistently, I say. But when there is contradiction in it, what are you going to do about it? I believe I realize fully the binding force of every declaration in my party platform. I hope I do, in any event. But if there is another plank in the platform which in its very nature is a repudiation of the demand for free tolls for coastwise vessels or any other vessels, what must I do in the circumstance?

One of the cardinal principles of the Democratic Party is and always has been opposition to subsidies of every kind. You may argue as much as you please, but the plain unvarnished truth is this free-toll exemption is a subsidy in its very nature. It can not be anything else. It is estimated that canal tolls for the first year or so ought to amount to $4,000,000. It is also estimated that one-half of this four millions would be collected from vessels engaged in coastwise trade. Now, what is the difference between a proposition to relieve these vessels from the payment of two millions of canal tolls and another proposition to pay the owners of such vessels exactly that amount out of the United States Treasury? If these vessels pay tolls, the Treasury gets the money. If they do not pay tolls, the Treasury and the people lose just the amount remitted.

Mr. Speaker, let us consider for a moment who will be benefited by this free-tolls proposition. To whom are we giving this subsidy? All the people? Not at all. A few corporations owning vessels engaged in coastwise trade will receive the benefit, and probably nobody else. Let us inquire what companies are engaged in our coastwise carrying trade at this time. Here are the names of some of them: Norfolk & Western Railway Co., Seaboard Air Line Railroad Co., the Southern Railway Co., Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co., Old Dominion Steamship Co., Central of Georgia Railway Co., New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., Merchants & Miners' Transportation Co., Pacific Mail Steamship Co., Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad. There are other companies engaged in coastwise trade, of course, but these names indicate the class of corporations which will be benefited by free tolls.

Very few corporations have facilities for putting vessels through the Panama Canal. Dockage and wharfage privileges are necessary, and these privileges are probably already under control of some carrying company. In the very nature of things few companies will engage in the business of carrying freight and passengers through the canal. It would be well, I think, for gentlemen to inquire just who is going to be helped before we agree to give up any part of the canal tolls.

Let us not forget the cost of that great work. Let us not forget that all the people paid for it. Let us also remember that it is going to cost a great deal to maintain and operate the canal. We are going to need the tolls. If we give those tolls to anybody and there is a deficit, the people will have to make good out of the Treasury. We can not afford it, Mr. Speaker. It is bad business policy—this giving away of tolls.

But we are told that if we give this advantage to our coastwise trade it will enable the companies owning coastwise vessels to charge cheaper freight rates. But the question is, Will they do it? I think not. I think the gentlemen composing the corporations owning and operating these coastwise vessels will pocket that $2,000,000 which the Treasury will lose during the first years of the operation of the canal, and certainly the amount they will pocket will increase as the years go by. The man who ships freight will never know that there has been a remission of the $1 or $1.25 or $1.50 per ton, whatever the amount per ton may be.

It is said by those who ought to know that the construction of the canal will reduce the distance across the continent just one-third. If this be true, and I have not heard it disputed, in the very nature of things the transcontinental railroads can not compete for that class of freight which coastwise vessels can get at all. Perishable freight, which requires quick transportation, will always be carried by the railroads. There can be no competition between the canal and the railroads for that class of merchandise. And the class of freight which does not require quick transportation will find its way through the canal, whether we repeal the exemption or not, because, as I have said, it can be carried very much cheaper through the canal, tolls or no tolls. The rate actually charged by way of the canal will probably be just enough under the railroad rate to bring business. Inasmuch as the canal shortens the distance between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts by one-third, the margin of difference in favor of the canal will be so great that the amount of tolls paid would hardly enter as a consideration. But, Mr. Speaker, why should we offer the use of the canal free of all charge to one class of our citizens, very few in number, and require everybody else to pay? Why make the ocean steamers pay and allow the coastwise vessels to go through free? Why the discrimination? Here is a coastwise vessel owned by one group of our fellow citizens. Here is an ocean-going steamer owned by another group. To one group the Government says, "You must pay for using the canal"; to the other group it says, "You may use the canal free." What great public service have these gentlemen who own the coastwise vessel rendered to entitle them to this special governmental favor? They are engaged in a business for the money they can make. They have rendered no greater public service than any other class of citizens, but it is now proposed to single them out for governmental favor.

It is said that our coastwise trade is reasonably prosperous, while our ocean-going merchant marine has almost disappeared from the seas. Likewise, it is said that there is little competition between companies engaged in coastwise business, while competition in the ocean-carrying trade is very keen. If we are going to give a subsidy to either, certainly those of our citizens who own ocean-going vessels need it the more. But why help either the one or the other in this way? The canal was built by all the people, not by any class. The taxes of all the people paid for its construction, not the taxes of any particular class. The companies owning these coastwise vessels paid no more than their just share of the burden, but one would suppose that they had built the canal themselves from the manner it is now proposed to treat them. They may use it free; all others must pay. Such discrimination can not be justified, and in my humble judgment will not be tolerated by the millions of Americans who know and realize that the canal was built with the taxes of all the people.

When the platform of my party tells me I must do this thing, I reply: "A mistake has been made; an injustice is about to be done; and the sooner the mistake is corrected the better it will be." I reply also: "There is a contradiction in the platform; there is, in any event, an inconsistency. I must construe the platform in the light of common sense." If I am not able to reconcile this apparent inconsistency, I will go back to my constituents and tell them, "I have done my duty as I saw it; now do with me as you deem proper." [Applause.]

In such a situation, Mr. Speaker, I think we should all, without regard to party, sustain the President in the courageous stand he has taken. The circumstances in which he finds himself placed are quite remarkable. He has made a candid, courageous statement. Instead of criticizing him, it seems to me he is entitled to our support. This crisis, if you are pleased to call it a crisis, is not of the President's making. He is not responsible for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty nor the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. While my friend Mr. CAMPBELL was making his appeal to prejudice in this Chamber I wondered what that great diplomat and statesman, John Hay, would have said—the man who taught that above all else we must preserve the honor of this Nation; who, as I have said, taught that humbuggery and sham and lying and deceit were not necessary in diplomacy; a great statesman, but a still greater diplomat; a just and good man—I wondered what he would have said if he could have sat here and heard such a speech as that delivered by the gentleman from Kansas. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe that Secretary Hay, if living, would tell us what ex-Secretary Root has told us—that the treaty with Great Britain means what it says, that when we agreed that we would treat the people of all nations equally and justly we can not exempt the owners of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls and require the citizens of other nations to pay tolls under similar circumstances. My friend Mr. CAMPBELL has even inserted a new word in the treaty. He says we agreed to treat the people of all "other" nations equally. The word "other" is not there.

That word "other" is Brother CAMPBELL'S own amendment to the treaty. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

This canal was built to promote the welfare of all mankind. It is not worthy of this Nation that we should attempt to use that triumph of American engineering to enable a handful of our citizens to save for themselves a few pitiful dollars. I believe if John Hay were living he would say no to such a proposition.

Mr. Speaker, the President did not write the plank in the platform demanding free tolls for coastwise vessels, but he is the President of all the people of this Republic and is trying to do his duty. In dealing with foreign nations he is our spokesman, and he has spoken. He would preserve the honor and good name of his country. He would preserve inviolate the contracts his predecessors have made. He would make the American name a synonym for honor, for honesty, for national integrity. Oh, but we must sacrifice all these things, because in the hurry and excitement of a national convention a demand which unintentionally involves a violation of all these things in its requirements found its way in the platform. The duties of the President are many and varied. The strain which he is now under we all know to be great. From a solemn sense of duty he is asking us to pass this law. He could have appealed to the prejudices of the American people very easily if he had not been Woodrow Wilson. He could have shielded himself against all the criticisms which have been leveled at him if he had been a demagogue. How easy it would have been to come in this Chamber and read a jingo message instead of the solemn plea we all heard. He is simply asking us to be true to ourselves, to be true to our Americanism, to act in accord with the very highest national ideals. Mr. Speaker, in this day of commercialism, in the mad struggle for gain the world over, let us, by our action in sustaining the President, authorize him to tell the world that Americans always keep the faith. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the discussion of the Panama Canal tolls proposition will not obscure the fact that there is another issue before the House at this time in this rule itself and that there is a vital relation between the two questions. This rule, brought in by the Rules Committee out of the midst of over a hundred propositions and resolutions which have slumbered peacefully for months, brings before this House a matter which has only recently assumed proportions of interest. It proposes to do four things—bind the House to immediate action on this proposition, prevent any adequate discussion of it, order the previous question, thus preventing amendment, and do away with special orders on succeeding days.

In no one of these particulars can this rule be defended. There is no need of the immediate consideration of this measure; in fact, this haste is distinctly opposed to the national interest. If this vote were delayed two weeks, while the people of the country were making their will known, I believe that the American spirit would find a way to prevent the adoption of the un-American policy embodied in the repeal of tolls exemption.

Neither is there any reason for curtailing the debate. No great emergency is at hand to demand action. It will be a long time before this repeal, if enacted, can become effective. It is a most important question, concerning international relationships, and has vital economic phases. Yet we are to limit the discussion to a few hours, while days are wasted upon trivial questions of no importance.

But, more than all else, there is no excuse for prohibiting amendment of the bill. The history of progress in parliamentary procedure, from a body merely registering the will of a despot to a body of free and independent representatives of the people, is the history of the right of amendment. Without that right, discussion is a sham and decision a fraud. The whole purpose of parliamentary law in free bodies is to secure the exact will of the membership. The right of amendment is imperative if that right is to be secured. The bill to which this rule applies is an unconditional repeal of a well-considered act of Congress. It does not permit the submission of the matter even to a fair consideration by an impartial tribunal. Scarcely a Member here but would change it in some particular were he to express his exact beliefs, and yet this rule prevents the change of a word.

In fact, this issue presented in the rule is whether the creature shall be greater than the creator, whether a committee shall be greater than Congress.

That issue being presented in the rule, it is significant that the same issue arises in the bill itself. The vote upon the measure will also answer the same question, whether the creature is greater than the creator, whether Congress is greater than the sovereign people of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in representative government. I believe that the people of this Nation are the sovereign power and should have the last word in all matters of commanding and compelling obedience. None will gainsay that statement as a theory, but there are many who do not believe in putting it into practice. However, all will admit that there must be a sovereign power in every nation; a power that can not be limited, since whoever or whatever could impose the limitations would be sovereign, so that the idea of limited sovereign power is a contradiction in terms. It can not be divided, for that means the existence of several sovereign powers able to issue and compel commands, and that is an obvious impossibility.

I maintain that the whole theory of American Government is that the people are supreme and that those who would limit or divide that supremacy have no place in that plan of government. At least the burden of proof rests upon them in the maintenance of their position.

In stating my position, I maintain that Representatives in Congress are not elected to follow their own will; they are elected by the people to carry out the will of the people. The will of the people is expressed in their decision upon candidates and platforms before them during an election. Why is a platform adopted? Simply to show what Representatives will do if they are elected and to give the people an opportunity to decide upon the candidates they desire to support. The very adoption of a platform establishes the fact that the Representative is a servant and not a master of the people.

Now, what did the platforms of the last election promise with regard to the Panama Canal tolls proposition? The declaration in the platform of the national Democratic Party, unanimously adopted in the Baltimore convention on July 2, 1912, was as follows:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American vessels engaged in coastwise shipping passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

The declaration in the platform of the national Progressive Party, unanimously adopted in the Chicago convention on August 7, 1912, was as follows:

> The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarially for their benefit. We demand that the canal shall be so operated as to break transportation monopoly now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads by maintaining sea competition with them; that ships directly or indirectly owned or controlled by American railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal; and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

The Republican Party made no definite pronouncement on the subject, but it is fair to assume that the decided stand of President Taft for the exemption of coastwise shipping was approved and was so regarded by the voters.

In any case, by on overwhelming majority, which left no doubt as to their will, the people indorsed these platforms and elected men pledged to carry their principles into effect.

To-day, however, we are considering, at the request of the President of the United States, the proposal to violate those platform pledges. Men who were elected on the strength of such covenants with the people are now forced to decide whether they will prove recreant to them and faithless to their promises.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that this is a fundamental proposition and involves more than a mere question of national policy with regard to the Panama Canal. All the struggle and sacrifice to obtain representative government has been in vain if Representatives can betray the people with impunity and mock their constituents by defying their will. I am convinced that the people will not tolerate this pledge breaking and that, not far in the future, they will, through the recall, take the power of punishment of such recreancy into their own hands.

However, an actual condition confronts us to-day, and we are to decide whether the provision that "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States" is to be repealed.

The Panama Canal is the most extensive, expensive, and successful engineering project ever undertaken by mortal man. Its 50-mile span divides the land and unites the waters, and is the greatest liberty man has ever taken with nature. It changes the map of the world, bringing Peru and Chile closer to New York than Oregon and California. It brings Seattle 7,800 miles nearer New York by water route and San Francisco 8,800 miles nearer New Orleans.

To dig this mighty waterway required the excavation of enough material to make a tunnel 12 feet square through the earth at the equator. Its completion marks the culmination of the dreams of men for the last 400 years, dreams which began almost the moment that Christopher Columbus found his northwest passage to the Indies blocked by two unknown continents. Attempts have been made before, France spending $300,000,000 in a colossal failure; but it was reserved for the American Nation to enter upon the mighty task and to accomplish it.

This Nation constructed the canal, furnished the engineering genius, the brain and the brawn, purchased a 10-mile strip of land along its course, paid every dollar of the expense, and assumed the entire cost of maintenance. It would seem a ridiculous suggestion that the United States did not have the right to exempt its own vessels engaged in coastwise shipping if it so desired.

But complications, due to international agreements, complicate the situation. These agreements are advanced by the President and others as good and sufficient grounds for the repeal of the exemption clause.

Let us see what these agreements are. The first was the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, entered into by America and Great Britain at a time when the Nicaraguan route was the only one believed feasible. This treaty contemplated the construction of an interoceanic canal by the two nations, which were to share the expense of the project.

Civil war was already beginning to cast its baleful shadows over this land. England owned important territory in South America and the West Indies and maintained a protectorate over the terminus of the canal as then planned. The task was so gigantic that it was deemed impossible of accomplishment save by the united efforts of both nations, and it was with that object in view that the treaty was made. Nothing was done under this agreement, and a half century went by, with no progress made in accomplishing the cleaving of the two continents.

Then, in 1901 the American Nation having seen the menace of such voyages as that of the Oregon around Cape Horn during the Spanish-American War, and realizing the tremendous commercial importance of a waterway at the Isthmus, demanded that the canal be constructed without the assistance of any other nation.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was drawn up and signed for that express purpose. It superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and under its terms the canal became an exclusively American enterprise.

It is expressly stated in this treaty that the United States shall enjoy all the rights of ownership, except as indicated in the treaty itself; shall enjoy exclusive control and power over the canal, and shall make all rules and establish the rates.

Article 3, which is the bone of contention in this controversy, is as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable.

There can be but one logical interpretation of that provision. The United States adopts the rules and guarantees equal treatment of all the nations observing them. There is a distinction between the United States and other nations, similar to the distinction between landlord and tenants.

But Great Britain takes the position, and is supported in it by the President, that the provision applies to the United States, and that the Panama Canal is not an American but an Anglo-American canal, in spite of the fact that England did not expend one cent in its construction.

Relying upon that interpretation, England declares that the United States can not exempt her own vessels, engaged wholly in domestic commerce, from the payment of canal tolls. This traffic is exclusively American, since no foreign nation can engage in it. There can be no discrimination against England in the exemption, since English vessels can not engage in the business. No foreign ship can clear from an American port with a cargo for any other American port, since that right is reserved entirely for American ships.

I maintain that there can not be discrimination in our treatment of commerce in which no other nation can engage. If there is any discrimination, it is to be found in this exclusive reservation, but no nation has ever protested against our policy in this regard, for it is universal among all nations. England claims the same right with regard to her own domestic commerce, and rightfully so. In the treaty of commerce of 1815 it is expressly stated that "no higher duties or charges shall be imposed in British ports on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels." But Great Britain has always held that this provision does not apply to her own domestic shipping, and as a matter of fact has always favored her vessels engaged in domestic commerce against American vessels and in distinction to her own vessels engaged in foreign commerce.

The United States in its treaties with other nations has always taken the same view. The treaty between this Nation and Denmark provides that "no higher charges shall be imposed in the ports of one party upon the vessels of the other than are or shall be payable in the same ports by native vessels."

In spite of the term "native vessels," which is much more definite than is used in the canal treaty, the United States has always excepted its vessels engaged in domestic trade, and has done so without protest.

The Supreme Court of the United States has passed directly upon this question in the case of Olson v. Smith (195 U. S., 332). The court held that the State law exempting American coastwise vessels from the payment of pilotage charges was not in violation of the treaty, which provided that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same port by vessels of the United States. The point of this decision bearing upon the British contention regarding the canal treaty is as follows:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel, coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with the treaty between Great Britain and the United States. Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of the vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance, the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

Mr. Speaker, it can not be argued that the canal territory has a different status of sovereignty than one of our harbors, since by the treaty with the Republic of Panama in 1903 the United States secured absolute sovereignty over the Canal Zone, a strip 5 miles on either side of the canal and extending 3 miles out to sea. Her rights in this territory are as complete and should be as unquestioned as her rights to the District of Columbia.

If anything further were needed to furnish conviction as to the meaning of the treaty, it would be found in the almost unanimous verdict of the Senators who ratified the treaty in 1901. One after the other of those who took an active part in the discussion leading up to the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty have declared that it could not possibly have passed that body had there been the slightest intimation that this country could not exempt its own coastwise vessels.

If the British contention is upheld by the passage of this repeal, it follows that the warships of the United States must pay the same tolls as those of foreign nations. On the same basis we could not fortify the canal; and yet we are doing that very thing and are making every effort to make the waterway impregnable. If we grant this contention now, we must admit that in time of war the United States could not embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or supplies within the Canal Zone; and yet there are none so foolish as to make that reservation upon American authority.

Judged from any viewpoint, whether from the strict technical construction of the terms of the treaty or from universally accepted rules, England has no concern whatever with our coastwise traffic, and her interference in this instance is an unwarranted attempt to dictate the management of purely national affairs.

Every honest American desires the fulfillment of every treaty obligation, and also wishes to preserve our good relations with the British Government. No patriotic American citizen, however, wishes his Government to meekly submit to an unjust demand and by hurried acquiescence to brand the former action taken by this Nation as dishonorable and unworthy. The American people covet the respect of other nations, but they will not purchase it by burying their own self-respect in the grave. The best way to merit and secure the respect of other nations is by an uncompromising stand for justice and right.

After it is admitted that there is no violation in the treaty in our exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, the argument is still made that such exemption is not in the public interest.

It is said that the exemption will favor only the shipowners, comprising a few men who have a monopoly of the domestic shipping. It will not do to say that because a monopoly exists we should take a step which will prevent the benefits of lower transportation charges. If a monopoly of the shipping business exists it is contrary to law, and can be destroyed. Private monopoly is always and everywhere opposed to the public welfare and it should be uprooted as one of the direst menaces to free government.

Neither will the exemption benefit only a few shipowners. If that argument is sound, our entire American system of waterway improvement is a colossal blunder. This Nation has spent more than half a billion dollars in affording water transportation, and it has all been spent on the basic principle that tolls shall not be levied on interstate commerce. That policy is as old as the Republic, and is definitely enacted in the rivers and harbors act of 1884. This law declares:

> That no tolls or operating charges whatever shall be levied upon, or collected from, any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, or canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation, now belonging to the United States, or that may hereafter be acquired or constructed.

As a matter of fact, that law in itself is an express prohibition of the imposition of tolls upon interstate commerce passing through the Panama Canal. It was existing law at the time of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and should be read into it, rather than the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which it repealed.

In any case, however, it is American policy, consistently upheld since the founding of the Nation, that no burdens shall be placed on interstate commerce. As far as that commerce is concerned, the Panama Canal is exactly the same kind of waterway as a canal or improved river within the country's limits.

Those who make the argument that exemption will benefit only the shipowners make the further plea that large sums will be necessary to pay for the construction and maintenance of the canal, and that every dollar possible should be added to the receipts of this waterway. Since when has it been American policy in the improvement of waterways to secure from individuals the cost of those improvements? They are made on the broad policy that the public interest demands that waterways shall be free of tolls, because cheap transportation means development and development means advantages and added opportunities for every man and woman and child in the country. The Atlantic and Pacific coasts are dotted with buoys and lighthouses for the protection of shipping nine-tenths of which is handled by foreign vessels. Still the Government does not levy tolls to recover the amount of money spent.

These advocates of tolls for American coastwise shipping would not advocate tolls on inland waterways; but there is absolutely no difference, as an economical proposition, between a barge of coal leaving Pittsburgh and passing through the locks of the Ohio and Mississippi to New Orleans and a vessel loaded with American products leaving Philadelphia and passing through the Panama Canal to San Francisco.

In fact, these arguments are so wholly at variance with American policy that it arouses the suspicion that selfish interests are back of them, and even the slightest investigation soon discloses the interests which would profit most by the imposition of added burdens upon this transportation.

These interests are the eight transcontinental railroad lines—the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, the Union Pacific, the Southern Pacific, the Missouri Pacific, the Santa Fe, the Canadian Pacific, and the Milwaukee & St. Paul. These railroads fought the construction of the canal, and now that it has been built they are fighting to minimize its service to the public. They dread water competition, for that compels cheap rates. With the Government owning the vital link in water competition, they can not effect a combination to oppress the people.

What does this competition mean? One instance will suffice. Oranges and lemons from California to New York pay railroad freight to-day of $27 a ton, carried in refrigerator cars. Consignments can be handled via the canal in a shorter period of time, and for $7 a ton. It has been estimated that the consuming public will be saved $10,000,000 a year on oranges and lemons alone.

The people realize that the cost of transportation is one of the elements which make the high cost of living a tragedy for millions of Americans. They have seen the predatory monopolies built up through railroad rebates and the fortunes amassed by private individuals through their control of these highways of commerce. They are determined to take from private interests the monopoly of transportation by supplying water competition through the use of the canal.

That was one of the great purposes which inspired the building of this gigantic waterway. Now, if a toll is placed upon the commerce passing through it, it means also a toll upon every ton of freight transported by land. For every dollar gained by a toll at the canal the people will pay additional dollars to the railroads of America.

President Wilson recognized that fact and expressed it with his characteristic clearness when, as a candidate for the Presidency, he said to an audience at Washington Park, N. J.:

> What interest have you in opening the canal to the ships of the world? We do not own the ships of the world. One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of Atlantic ports, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast. One of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You can see the object of that, can't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.
> [Applause.]

Those words are as true to-day as they were when they were spoken in the midst of a campaign for votes. And yet President Wilson is urging the repeal of the very provision he so highly commended, and which, if repealed, will be surely followed by the demand that another provision be nullified also—that which prohibits railroad-owned vessels from using the canal. Great Britain has already entered her protest against it, and it will be under fire the moment the provision under discussion at this time is repealed.

Mr. Speaker, if President Wilson has secured information that has led him to change his opinions on this matter, I submit that it is but fair that he should acquaint Congress and the country with those facts. He is not wont to be so uncommunicative, and, in fact, he has established a reputation for the use of "pitiless publicity." As governor of New Jersey he made the following statement of his views regarding the value of light on public affairs:

> Gentlemen who have been associated with me in other undertakings have complained of my habit of talking. They have complained that I do not regard anything that concerns the public interest as confidential. I do not. I never shall, and I give notice that I am going to take every important subject of debate in the legislature out on the stump and discuss it with the people. * * * You know what happens when everybody is silent, very quiet; when everybody refrains from discussing in public matters that happened in the legislature.

Why should Congress be kept in ignorance of the facts while imploring requests for immediate action are made? This is too serious a matter and freighted with too grave consequences for a blindfolded step. It will mold history, for history is not the record of accidental happenings. It is the working out of causes into effect through the operation of laws as immutable and eternal as those of seedtime and harvest.

Nations reap precisely what they have sown and nothing else. A timorous yielding of rights to-day will lead to a surrender of greater rights to-morrow. A false step now means a long departure from the true path later.

It is only fair for Congress to refuse to comply with the request of the administration until the facts are made known. Personally I have voted for administration measures almost without exception during this session, and desire above everything else to support President Wilson in every act which will benefit the people of America. I do that gladly, but I will not vote to surrender the rights of the people and to put this Nation at the feet of Great Britain and a railroad monopoly. I have put patriotism above partisanship, and I will also put patriotism above pusillanimous surrender of national rights.

With all the knowledge we now possess, yielding to British demands now means a complete reversal of the patriotic attitude of Washington and Jefferson and Jackson and Cleveland.

If the slightest gleam from the luster of their patriotic deeds should reach us now, it ought to prevent Congress from surrendering American rights without even an attempt to secure the decision of an impartial tribunal. No matter how delicate the diplomatic situation, it can not be momentous enough for this country to yield to any foreign power the right to dictate its own purely domestic affairs. If England has us in such a position, we should know it, for it is surely time for a new declaration of independence.

Higher than everything else is the unmistakable command of the American people. We are not responsible for results; we are responsible for keeping faith with the people and with the principles of representative government, to secure which uncounted treasure and priceless lives have been poured out lavishly. It rests with every Member of this House to do his duty in upholding that principle, in the assurance that no honor and no reward, however great, can compare with the tribute due a representative of the people who can point to his record and say, "The promises I made to the people have been performed with all loyalty and honesty. I have kept the faith."

Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to believe that this great body, representative of the American people, will adopt this "gag" rule, which robs it of the exercise of independent judgment, or will pass a measure which means that the Stars and Stripes shall be pulled down from its place over the American canal at Panama, while in its place is hoisted a piece of muslin with the British Union Jack on one side and the white of nerveless neutrality on the other. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the adoption of this rule, because I believe it expedites the consideration of this, the most important question of to-day to the American people, and one in which the honor of the Nation is involved. I need no text from the President to determine me in my course. I voted against free tolls two years ago when the question was here for consideration. [Applause.] I voted then against free tolls because I believed that we had a contract that we were in honor bound to keep. I voted then against free tolls because of the economical question involved.

We spent $400,000,000 in the construction of the canal, and the interest on that will amount to $10,000,000 every year. This interest charge will be added to by the expenditure of $10,000,000 more to maintain an Army on the Isthmus, $4,000,000 for the operation of the canal, $1,000,000 to maintain it, and $250,000 rent to the Government of Panama.

I see no reason now, I saw no reason then, why this monopoly operating coastwise ships should be given privileges that no other American can enjoy. [Applause.] Already having a monopoly of the trade, there can be no good reason why every man in the United States not enjoying the privilege of that monopoly should pay a tax to maintain the monopoly by giving them the opportunity of passing their ships through the canal free. There is no more reason why the men who own the coastwise ships should pass their ships through the canal without the payment of tolls than there is that the farmer should have his profits increased, that the lawyer should have his fees increased, that the mechanic should have his wages increased, or that the laborer should have his wages increased, by the payment of a tax out of the pockets of private citizens everywhere in this country. [Applause.] The time has come when we must go on record in favor of maintaining the national honor. [Applause.] I do not care whether our contract is with England or with any other nation in the world; the question with me is, have we a contract; and if we have, then it ought to be lived up to to the strictest letter of the word in the contract. [Applause.] It does not matter to me how great the enemy may be, if I have a contract with him I will keep it. I would not under any circumstances consider that I had the right to do as a Representative of the American people what I would not do as a private citizen under any contract that I might sign, and to vote to admit coastwise ships through this Panama Canal free under the treaty which prevails between this country and England, and which involves every nation in the world, would to me seem to be a dishonorable action; and I will never by my vote as a Representative in this House do that which I would not consider I have a right in honor to do as a private citizen. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Kansas to consume some of his time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill referred to in the rule. I am not going to undertake to discuss the merits of that bill now. I may do so later in the general debate, but while I am for that bill I am opposed to this rule in its present form, for the reason that the rule as it stands denies to the membership of this House the right to offer amendments to this bill. Since I have been a Member of Congress no bill has been presented to it where the right of amendment was more important than is the right of amendment to this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House who will vote for the bill may be divided into two groups—one believing that the exemption of our coastwise traffic is an economic wrong, but not in violation of the treaty; the other group believing that economically it is sound, but in violation of the treaty; and those two groups will combine upon this vote, and it ought not to be said when this bill goes out from this House, passed as it will be by those votes, that it should be treated as any construction of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty at all. Therefore, this House ought to have the right to offer such amendments as will make it clear that this is not a construction of the treaty, in order that future Congresses may feel free to deal with the question as they see fit. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there are two propositions involved in the Sims bill, one the repeal of the exemption of our coastwise traffic from tolls, and the second proposition undertakes to regulate the amount of tolls that shall be charged to all shipping, fixing a maximum of $1.25 per net registered ton and a minimum of 75 cents per net registered ton. If this bill is open to an amendment, and an amendment be offered providing that the President of the United States may fix a less rate for American ships than others if under the treaty, it having first been submitted to arbitration, it shall be held that our Government has the right to make this discrimination, who will say that that kind of an amendment would not be in order on this bill? Who will say that it would not leave the Congress of the United States in a much better situation, in a more dignified position, without any question of surrender of its rights, if such an amendment were adopted to this bill, and at the same time, Mr. Speaker, it would accomplish everything, so far as any present crisis is concerned, that should be accomplished.

So much for the importance of the right of amendment. In previous sessions of Congress, since the Democrats have been in power, I have taken occasion from time to time when rules of exactly this character were offered from the Democratic side cutting off the right of amendment, to oppose such rules, and in such opposition I occasionally quoted from the speeches of prominent Members of this House, including the Speaker himself, when his party was in the minority, when they opposed rules of exactly this character when Mr. Cannon was Speaker of the House. Mr. Speaker, I want to take occasion now to spend just a moment upon that question.

On the 7th day of last May, after the Underwood tariff bill had been completed in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and immediately before its final passage, the distinguished Speaker of this House made a speech, a splendid speech, as all his speeches are, congratulating the Democratic majority and the country upon that bill; and during the course of the remarks of the Speaker he used this language:

> My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is very fond of quoting the speeches that I made on the floor of this House, especially when I was minority leader. They are good speeches. Some time before long I want him to get up here and read a five-minute speech that I made when they forced a rule through this House to consider the Payne tariff bill.

Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity [laughter on the Republican side] that I have felt proper to accept the invitation of the distinguished Speaker, and I am going to do it now, not for the purpose of seeking to embarrass the Speaker—not at all—but for the purpose of advising the Democratic majority, so many of them being new Members, of what the real attitude of the Speaker is upon rules of this character, because I take it for granted that the Speaker himself will not take the floor upon this rule. The Speaker said in his speech:

> I said then that I was in favor of discussing a tariff bill section by section and of permitting any Member of the House to offer any amendment he pleased. And it has come to pass. It is being done. There has been no rule brought in. You gentlemen can not kick and squirm hereafter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that was a tariff bill comprising something like 4,000 items and a great many provisions. The same was true of the Payne-Aldrich bill, concerning which the Speaker made the speech that he invited me to read to the House upon some future occasion, and which I am now about to do. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is a bill of 19 lines. There is some occasion in great tariff bills, involving thousands and thousands of items, for cutting off to some extent the right of amendment and debate; but, Mr. Speaker, what excuse can be offered for cutting off the right of amendment on a bill containing 19 lines, a bill as important as any Member of this House has considered in the past, and probably as important as any Member of this House will consider in the future? Now, Mr. Speaker, what is this language that the Speaker asked me to read upon some future occasion? The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, which was passed in 1909, contained several thousand items, and there was a limited right of amendment, and I voted against the rule, together with the Speaker and the Democratic minority, as it was then, and upon that bill——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LENROOT. I am going to get this quotation in. And this is what the Speaker said upon that occasion; and I am sure, sir, that his position now must be that the previous question should be voted down upon this rule and the right of amendment agreed to. This is what the Speaker said:

The situation about this matter is this. I am against this rule and every rule like it.

And this is like it, only more so. [Laughter.]

My position is that the humblest Member of this House, the veriest congressional tenderfoot here, has a right to offer an amendment to any item in this bill from A to Z.

And then there was applause on the Democratic side. Why do not you applaud now? [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, if you will practice what you have preached in that applause we will have a right to amend this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to appeal to every man who is in favor of this bill to vote down the previous question; and if it is voted down I will offer an amendment that will give this House the right to offer amendments to this bill; and if that right is given, this bill will go out from this House in such form that no Member of the House need feel that the United States has surrendered anything. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to indulge in any parliamentary tight-rope performance before this House this afternoon, as my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] did. I am against the rule, like the gentleman from Wisconsin, but, unlike the gentleman from Wisconsin, I am against the bill.

Mr. Speaker, in time the problem of the transcontinental freight rate will pass, in time the century-old controversy over aid to our merchant marine will be settled, in time the distractions of unhappy Mexico will disappear, and the seals of secrecy on our foreign policy will be broken and its affairs of nearer consequence and great delicacy will be revealed and will fade into forgetfulness, political parties clamoring their contentions here will come and go, but if we shut the gates of the Panama Canal against our domestic traffic now, we close them forever. [Applause.] We act here not for to-day but for all time. In this question there are many issues, but there is one that is paramount—our sovereignty.

I am willing for the moment to forego contemplation of the attitude of the transcontinental railroads. For over 25 years they bent every effort to prevent the digging of this canal. Now, when it nears completion, they propose, through the aid of foreign allies, to impair its use. I am willing for the moment to waive consideration of the contradictory proposition that our domestic traffic shall have free passage in the Ohio but shall meet an embargo in the waters of the Isthmian Canal. But I am not willing as an American citizen here to subscribe to a situation which places this Nation, with 100,000,000 people, in the attitude of hesitating to maintain the Monroe doctrine which it had the courage to impose upon the world when it had but 10,000,000 people. [Applause.] I am not willing by my vote to surrender the sovereignty of the United States over the waters of our canal. [Applause.]

Gentlemen have speculated here this afternoon as to what really is the unknown element of diplomatic embarrassment upon which this crisis pivots—what the mysterious words of the President meant. None of us knows, but I believe that the answer to the mystery is that we, for the present at least, have been beaten by superior British diplomacy. [Applause.] But I do not know the complications which have brought this crisis. We are asked not to suspend toll exemption until our rights may be arbitrated. We are asked to confess national dishonor. Now, I do not know the conditions which made England and Japan friends. I do not know the conditions which made Japan and Huerta allies. I do not know how near the truth the rumor is that we are under the necessity of suing for the favor of Great Britain, as Japan's friend, to lighten our responsibility down in muddled Mexico.

These are entangling alliances it is not given me to know. The facts surrounding them are not in my possession. I do not think they are in the possession of any Member of this House. But the known facts, the visible facts, in this situation are plain and elementary so far as our rights in the canal are concerned. If the canal had been the work of many nations, if it had been constructed through the contributions of many nations, if it had been built through absolutely neutral territory, if the profit which might come from it was to be shared by all those nations alike, or the deficit, if one followed, was to be met equally by all those nations, and if it were unfortified, it would not be our canal. But the canal was built over our own territory. It was constructed by an expenditure of our own funds. If a profit come from it, it is ours to enjoy; if a deficit is to be met, it is ours alone to meet. It is under our exclusive control, and it is fortified. It is our canal, to have and to hold. This no one can successfully deny, on the terms of the treaty or otherwise. Possession, construction, control, profit and loss, and fortification spell ownership, and ownership spells sovereignty. The supreme issue, then, is not the economic question of how we shall adjust our transportation rates, but whether we shall have the right to adjust them at all.

Can there be read into the treaty of 1901 a surrender of this sovereignty? Is there a line in it that denies us this, our sovereign right over the canal? There is not one. The conditions and interests of the United States and England in 1850 were not the conditions and interests of those two countries in 1901, and the conditions and interests of the two nations are not to-day what they were in 1901. If the canal had been built in 1850, under the Bulwer-Clayton treaty, it would have been through neutral territory, it would have been under the joint control of Great Britain and the United States, and it would have been unfortified. If the canal had been built in 1901, that canal would have been built by the United States; it would have been under the control of the United States; it would have been fortified by the United States, but it would have been constructed through alien territory. Now it is to be completed in 1915. It is constructed over our own territory, granted to us in perpetuity. It is built through an expenditure of our own funds. Our control of it is exclusive. The rules for its government are set down by us, and the world is notified by us and asked to adhere to those rules, not by Great Britain and the United States, but by us alone. And the canal is fortified.

The conditions surrounding the Bulwer-Clayton treaty of 1850 were not the conditions surrounding the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. Through the years there were withdrawn from the relations between the United States and Great Britain the element of neutralized territory through which the canal runs, the element of mutual responsibility for the protection of the work, the element of joint control, and the element of divided sovereignty. There survives in the treaty a general principle of neutralization which was in article 8 of the Bulwer-Clayton treaty, and which is in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Under that general principle Great Britain is guaranteed equal treatment with the nations of the world observing the rules the United States lays down, but only on condition that Great Britain observes the rules the United States adopts.

All three political parties are pledged to the people of the United States in this matter. Thirteen million voters in 1912 indorsed the action which it is sought to overturn here. And how is it proposed to break that covenant made by the majority party here at Baltimore?

Here is a rule brought in to shut out amendment and to limit debate. I have seen a good many special rules here in my time. This by far is the most important question ever brought before this body since my service here. As a general thing the cloture rules are justified and excused on partisan grounds, but how on earth any American citizen, sitting here as a representative of the people, can defend a proposition which denies amendment and limits debate when a question of national honor is in question, I can not conceive. Why should any representative of whatever party stand for cloture here?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; not now. I have seen you Republicans on this side cloture a tariff bill. I have seen you Democrats on the other side cloture appropriation bills; but I never expected to live to see the day when on a question of international importance like this men could be found on the Republican side and on the Democratic side, alike, willing to be bound against free action, willing to shut off reasonable debate and amendment. But more important than the question of cloture is the question of the surrender of our sovereignty over the canal. Before the surrender, my friends, this bill may appear of little moment to many. But after the surrender each succeeding year will emphasize the error you are about to commit here. Before the surrender, diplomatic and partisan exigency; after the surrender, the vain regret of a strong nation through the centuries.

There is just one thing for the American representative to do here. He ought to abide by his platform, which is a sacred covenant with his people. The thing to do here, forget the matter of political expediency, forget the diplomatic complications at the White House, and vote for our own control over our own domestic traffic in our own canal. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] was right when he started out by stating that in a little while men and parties would pass away and be of no importance, and I hoped that, like Saul of Tarsus, he had seen a sudden light that would have enabled him to have wound up that opening sentence in the right way. Men will pass away, parties will pass away, party platforms will pass away, but the honor of a nation can not be trampled in the ground and its effect pass away. [Applause.]

We come here with no apology for our position. The people of America are not so much interested in what platforms say as they are in whether what we do here is right or wrong. In my humble judgment, if there were not a treaty in existence touching our relations with the Panama Canal, our obligation would still remain to deal with the nations of the earth on terms of equality touching its commercial use.

Much has been said as to its being our canal. I also believe that it is an American canal. I believe in our right to control it in all ways necessary to our political welfare. When many men now vociferous in their protest against what they declare a surrender were silent, my voice was raised in favor of fortifying that canal, because I believed it was an American canal. But there is a distinction between our rights as a sovereign touching matters that affect us in a political sense and our obligations to the world touching the commercial use of that canal. For 75 years we have held out to the world the promise that we would build the canal for no narrow commercial advantage. We were not undertaking the greatest work ever performed by the hand of man in order to seek some small dollar-and-cent advantage for ourselves. The Nation's conception of that canal was bigger than that. The people of this country saw in it something more than simply the right to give a preferential bounty to American ships. They saw the performance of a great work in the interest of humanity by the only nation with the power and resources sufficient to do that particular work.

It was in that spirit that we entered into all our negotiations. More than that, during the time when we were a weak Nation, from the time when Jefferson declared that "the ocean belongs to all men and the rivers to all the inhabitants thereof," we have fought for the freedom of the seas, we have fought for the opening of rivers, we have fought for the opening of straits. We have denied the right to close the seas. Only once in our diplomatic history have we ever seen fit to go against that policy, and that was in the Bering Sea controversy, when we undertook to close a sea with a mouth 1,600 miles wide; and we lost, as we deserved to lose, our contention. Now we have built a great canal, and men here to-day would have us sacrifice the Nation's honor for the sake of a paltry advantage to the most merciless monopoly in America. It does not matter by whom that shipping is controlled, by the very law that gives it the exclusive right to the coastwise trade it is made a complete monopoly, and in that cause we are asked to forego our obligation.

I do not want now to more than touch upon the matters relating to the treaties, because I hope later on to go into details in regard to them; but I say to you that the reason that led to the abolition of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and to the enactment of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was no desire to get a narrow commercial advantage. It was a desire that America should do the building itself, and should have the control of the canal in its political aspect, because, as President Hayes well said, we are making a new coast line for America. We first invited England to enter into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—invited her for two reasons, not only on account of claims she was making to part of Central America, which she surrendered in that treaty, but also with the desire to invite English capital, which we then believed was necessary to the building of the canal. We entered into that treaty, and we kept its terms while it was in existence, although it chafed us because of the fact that it recognized the right of England to a joint ownership and control of the canal. We got from under that, I repeat, for the sake of no small commercial advantage, but in order that we might have the political control of the canal. And England consented to it; consented to it with the understanding, as expressed in plain terms, that there should be equality of treatment to all the nations.

Now we would undertake to dim the luster of that great undertaking by adding a special privilege, an exemption for American ships. That is why the President of the United States, big enough to look beyond passing events, seeing the Nation's honor as it is viewed not only here, but by the civilized world, comes and asks at your hands this repeal.

Men get excited over what they claim is a base surrender. Let me say that I never knew a strong man yet who hesitated to do what was right for fear that his motive would be misunderstood. [Applause.] It is the coward, it is the weakling in life, it is the man who is doubtful of his own ground that fears to take a position lest somebody call him craven. The American Nation does nothing out of fear. It does not take its position touching this matter because of the threat of any nation or any group of nations on earth. The condition of America is not one where it must make a surrender in order to preserve itself, but it is not willing to rest in the eyes of the world as breaking not only a solemn treaty, but also as giving the lie to its professions for 75 years of its existence, as having gone back on what it stood for since the beginning—freedom of the ocean. Why, when America was ushered into the family of nations there was hardly any of the high seas that was not being claimed by some particular power.

The very names of the oceans bore witness to the sovereignty that was sought to be put upon them. The Spanish Main was simply an indication of the claim of Spain to what is now the open sea. The voice of America, then as now, was against such pretensions.

The neutralization of the Suez Canal is maintained by certain signatory powers. Suppose those powers were to get together and say: "We will charge American ships, but we will let our own coastwise ships go through without tolls, because nobody can engage in coastwise shipping except our own vessels." How long would the United States rest silent against such a discrimination? It would no sooner be known than her protest would go out to all the world, and she would deny the right to close that canal upon terms of inequality to her. That was her protest as to the Straits of Magellan. That was her protest touching the sound dues with Denmark. That was her protest touching the Amazon and all the other great rivers of the world.

That was the reason for the rebuke administered to an American officer for asking permission to go through the Dardanelles. That was why, with all the great nations paying tribute to the Barbary pirates, we made answer to their demand with the voice of our guns off Tripoli, and American heroism in the cause of freedom, not of privilege, gave new glory to the Nation.

And yet here we are asked to make this exception for our own selfish benefit. I say to my Democratic colleagues, worry not about what the enemy may throw at you touching platform declarations. Above these taunts lies your duty in the maintenance of a Democratic administration under the leadership of a President big enough to do the right whether it be popular or not; and high above them all rests the honor of the Nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, every gentleman who has yet spoken in this debate has emphasized the great importance of the question that we are about to decide. Why, then, should we limit the debate and prevent the right to amend? [Applause.] If the question is of such overwhelming importance, does it not deserve the best judgment of the Congress, after full discussion and the opportunity to make suggestions?

We are about to construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. England claims that the language of the treaty forbids the granting of any preferential rights to the vessels of any nation. That treaty has been many times construed by this Government. It has been five times construed by the Senate of the United States—twice in acts of Congress and three times in consenting to treaties. It has been twice construed by the House of Representatives. It was four times officially construed by President Roosevelt—once in approving an act of Congress and three times in submitting treaties to the Senate for ratification. It was officially construed by President Taft when he signed the Panama Canal act. It was twice construed by John Hay as Secretary of State, when he signed two treaties involving the question. It was once officially construed by ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of State, when he signed a treaty with the Republic of Colombia. In all these constructions of the treaty the claim of England was denied and the right of the Government of the United States to grant certain preferences was maintained. [Applause.]

With this history of constructions of this treaty, do you think it proper to overrule all these constructions in the past, by a limit of debate, and refusal to permit amendment under the application of the gag rule? Since when, on these great questions which transcend party policies, which break away from the theory of partisanship—since when do you propose to revoke the construction placed upon this treaty by our Government for 12 years, and give a new construction demanded by England, against our interests, under the application of gag rule? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I am just as tender about the honor of our country as are those gentlemen who prate about it. I never yet discovered that anyone added to his reputation by bragging all the time how he respected his honor. [Applause.] I suspect the motives of any gentleman when he construes a contract, holding up his hands in holy horror and saying, "Watch me, I am honorable, other men are dishonorable." [Applause.]

I would not do a thing which injured the honor of our country. I would not do a thing which prejudiced our reputation; but when we are right, I see no reason why we should surrender because of the fancied plea that honor is involved. Honor is involved on both sides. If there is honor involved here, it is the honor of Great Britain, seeking to drive a hard bargain with this administration and with this Congress. Our honor is above suspicion. The honor of Great Britain in this matter is subject to open attack. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives [Mr. FLOOD]. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the question of honor involved in this proposition is not that of Great Britain trying to drive a hard bargain, but the United States keeping a contract that it has made and signed, and to keep it even if it is against our interest to do so. Regardless of the question of whether the exemption of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls is a wise economic policy, regardless of whether that exemption constitutes a subsidy, leaving out of consideration the question of whether that exemption is a violation of the provisions of the treaty of November 18, 1901, concerning the canal, I believe this rule should be adopted, and the bill which it provides for should be speedily put upon its passage, in order that we may aid and forward the magnificent foreign policy of President Wilson and his administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They ask, Mr. Speaker, what that policy is. It is a policy of honor, a policy of integrity between the nations, a policy of keeping a contract that has been made, a policy of peace which, if not hampered and hindered by selfish interests, will bring about the most prolonged and beneficent era of peace that has ever been known in the history of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the President, with his wide vision, his extraordinary acquirements, and his acute insight into the heart of economic, political, and international questions, recognizes, and has so stated, that the enactment of this legislation is essential to enable him to meet and properly deal with great international problems that now confront this country, problems that can only be dealt with if we have the confidence and respect of the nations of the world. What act could Congress pass that would inspire greater confidence among our sister nations than an act like this, in which we are doing right even at the sacrifice of our own interest? [Applause.]

Our country could not occupy a nobler position than that of so construing a contract that the doubt is resolved in favor of the other party to that contract.

This country is great, Mr. Speaker. It is strong; no one will attribute our action to weakness. We have given in the past ample proof of our mettle; we need fear no imputation of cowardice. We are rich; we can even afford to allow this great monopoly to have some of its profits cut off. We are known to be a proud people, and no one will say that we are not jealous of our rights. Let us adopt this rule; let us pass this bill; let us do the thing that every man knows is honest; and let us by this act gain for to-day and forever the confidence and respect of all the nations of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, an honorable nation no less than an honorable man will keep a contract to the letter and the spirit without counting the cost.

The only argument in favor of this bill worth considering is "Does honor demand its passage?"

Pride in the national honor is one of the strongest sentiments of the American people.

Jealous in this respect, no argument appeals so powerfully to them as the plea that honor requires the action proposed.

The American people admire the man who stands up for his engagements, who stands plumb in his tracks; and the gentlemen who are urging this bill, taking advantage of this jealous national trait, are making the plea that national honor requires the repeal of the free-tolls law. They arrogate to themselves a finer though a belated sense of honor than the Congress which passed the law possessed.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is such a thing as standing overplumb. There is the fantastical and irrational sense of honor which inspired Don Quixote, in his assault upon the windmill, in which all sense of proportion, obligation, or duty is lost.

In this case advocates of repeal are standing overplumb. Their posture is the posture of obeisance to Great Britain, losing sight of their obligation and duty to the American people.

The United States at enormous expense has made a waterway through the Isthmus of Panama, which will be of great benefit to all mankind.

With her eyes open, she undertook this herculean task, well aware that her own commerce to be benefited is absolutely insignificant in volume compared with the commerce of the other nations, and especially the commerce of Great Britain, which is greater than that of all other nations combined.

Now, as the builder and owner of the canal, she proposes rates of toll that are free and open to all the nations of the earth upon exactly the same terms, giving no advantage to American commerce, except to her coastwise traffic.

If free tolls to our coastwise traffic stood alone and were to be considered as a mere economic question without reference to its influence on continental railroad rates or to international relations, President Wilson would undoubtedly be right in seeking the repeal of the free-tolls law, on the ground that all vessels using the Panama Canal should pay an equitable share of the expense.

But this question does not stand alone. The economic feature has become wholly negligible, in view of the attempts of Great Britain and the President of the United States to convict the American Congress and the American people of a dishonorable act in passing the free-tolls law in willful violation of a treaty. The question of dollars sinks into insignificance compared with the surrender of America's rights of ownership and regulation of her own domestic affairs that are involved in the British demand.

As evidence of American good faith it is important to note that the rate of tolls established will for many years, according to the best estimates obtainable, show a large deficit annually, which must be met by taxes raised from our own people. Burdened by the cost of construction and maintenance as the people of the United States are, the established rates are more than just, more than equitable, and are liberal in the extreme.

To give our coastwise trade free tolls is a matter of no concern to Great Britain; it is no discrimination against her; it in nowise affects her shipping; yet in practical application it does affect her manufacturing interests and ours.

If Great Britain can sell her goods cheaper in San Francisco than the New England manufacturer can, she will command that market, and tolls charged on New England goods passing through the canal would be just that much to the advantage of Great Britain.

This is the "nigger in the woodpile." This and the solicitations of the Canadian and United States railroad interests are the real reasons for the absurd and arrogant interference of Great Britain with the right of the United States to handle her own internal affairs as she sees best; either to refund tolls paid by coastwise traffic, or to subsidize her traffic as other nations do, or to give free tolls, which all amounts to precisely the same thing.

But, Mr. Speaker, the question before this House is, Has Great Britain the right to dictate how the United States shall manage the canal?

The British Government and the President of the United States and those who speak for them would give the United States no right in the canal except "the exclusive right to pay the bills."

It is not presumption for me to undertake to interpret the treaty relations embraced in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of the United States and Great Britain, because its language is plain and the intent is clear.

Gentlemen may elaborate in learned disquisition upon the treaties of 1815, 1848, 1850, and 1900, but when all is said and done the treaty of 1901, commonly called the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, construed in the plain and ordinary significance of the words used, contains everything that is pertinent to its interpretation.

In proof of this I quote:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of 19th April, 1850.

Thus we see that the only other treaty concerning the canal is abrogated and has nothing whatever to do with this discussion, for even in the matter of interpretation the new treaty must stand alone as evidence of the intent of the parties.

All the relations of the parties concerning the subject are contained in the remaining four articles. Let us see what they are:

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the United States, * * * and that, subject to the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of such canal.

Now, since the United States bought the land and constructed the canal and paid all the bills, what are "the rights incident to such construction"? Beyond all question it is unqualified, absolute ownership. There is not a suggestion nor hint in these two articles that Great Britain has any right of any sort in the canal.

Whatever right Great Britain has in the canal must be found in article 3, because the other articles in the treaty merely provide that no change of territorial sovereignty shall change the relations of the parties and for the method of ratification. Let us, then, examine this article:

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules—that is to say:

Rule 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise; such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The whole question of interpretation is whether the words "all nations" include the United States or whether the term really means "all other nations." We can go nowhere to learn the intention of the parties except to these six rules.

The United States as owner "adopts" these rules "that define the conditions under which all other nations" observing them without discrimination may use the canal.

So far as the use of the canal is concerned, these rules give all nations the same right in the canal that all nations now have in any other United States port. They are simply the international conventions pertaining to belligerency. But nobody will pretend that any nation at war with the United States has any right in a United States port. [Applause.]

And it is just here that the significance of the British demand appears. If the words "all nations" is interpreted to include the United States, then the United States, whether in war or peace, would have no other rights in the canal than any other nation with which she might be at war.

This is the real "milk in the coconut." Free tolls for our coastwise traffic may be wise or unwise, but whether the one or the other does not concern Great Britain; but it is the British excuse, the "nose of the camel thrust into the tent" by which Great Britain hopes to take away from the United States the strategic advantage which the control of the canal would give her against an enemy. [Applause.]

Now, if we assume that "all nations" includes herself, we take the absurd position that after building the canal the United States had to include herself as one of the "all nations" in order to give herself the use of the canal. And if we assume that "all nations" include herself, we are taking the equally absurd position that the United States, as grantor, grants herself as one of the "all nations" certain rights as grantee, among which are that she will not discriminate against herself.

Under rule 1, the United States must charge the warships of all nations alike. Here it is evident that the warships of "all other nations" is intended, for it would be nonsense for the United States to pay tolls out of one pocket into her other pocket for the passage of her own ships through her own canal.

The interpretation that "all nations" includes the United States is unreasonable, while the interpretation that "all nations" really means "all other nations" removes all ambiguity and makes it plain that all (other) nations observing these rules shall be treated without discrimination, and the charges shall be just and equitable as to them.

But rule 1 is only one of the rules prescribed which indicate that "all nations" means "all other nations."

Rule 2 prescribes that "the canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war nor any act of hostility be committed within it."

If this rule includes the United States, how ridiculous it was that the United States should seriously and solemnly stipulate that she would not blockade her own property. [Applause.] If rule 2 was adopted for the observance of herself as one of the "all nations," what a frightful spectacle might be presented if the United States should blockade herself in the "big ditch."

Rule 3 prescribes "vessels of war of belligerents shall not take any stores in the canal."

Here, again, if the United States is one of the "all nations," she not only will have to charge herself tolls, but that having gone to great expense with the avowed purpose of securing a great strategical position she has deliberately stipulated that if she should ever be engaged in war when this strategical position would become of great advantage, she would surrender it and give her enemy equal use of the canal.

Rule 4 prescribes "no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops or munitions of war in the canal."

If the United States is included as one of the "all nations" and should become engaged in war, she could not use a man nor a gun in her fortifications on the canal; she would not even have the right to embark her garrison there to fetch it away nor at any time to send it munitions of war.

Rule 5 prescribes further regulations of belligerents.

Rule 6 prescribes that "the plant, and so forth, shall be part of the canal" and "shall enjoy perfect immunity from attack by belligerents."

Again, we have the absurd situation that if the United States is one of the "all nations" she is solemnly stipulating that she will not destroy her own property.

It is certainly clear that of the six rules adopted by the United States, none of them can possibly apply to the United States. They were made not for "all nations," but for "all other nations." [Applause.]

Great Britain understood this very well. On the 8th of July, 1912, the chargé d'affaires, of the British embassy, practically admitted that there could be no objection to the exemption from tolls of our coastwise vessels, and this was confirmed by Sir Edward Grey November 14, 1912.

And on the 17th of January, 1913, Sir Edward substantially agreed that the United States had the right to exempt all her shipping of every sort if it would not "impose upon British or other foreign shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal." But taking the cue from Senator ROOT'S speech, made in the Senate January 21, 1913, Great Britain changed her tone and made her present preposterous demands.

Under the construction now put upon the treaty by President Wilson and Great Britain, if we should be at war with Japan, Japan would have the right to use the canal we have built to bring her fleets to New York, and we would have no right to object. Does anybody pretend that we built the canal for the free use of any nation at war with the United States?

Mr. Speaker, the American people built that canal for no such fool purpose. [Laughter and applause.]

They stipulated that they would adopt rules that should give the use of our canal to all other nations without discrimination in conditions and charges, which should be just and equitable and of which they reserve the sole right to judge.

Upon all other questions they stand upon their sovereign rights as builders of the canal and owners of the soil. At great expense they give to all other nations the use of the canal without discrimination on just and equitable terms; but, as owners, reserve to themselves the right to fortify and defend, to close it to any enemy whose belligerency should forfeit all right to its use, or open it to our coastwise commerce, which, whether this is wise or unwise, is in fact no concern of any other nation, whether friend or foe.

They built that canal to break up the conspiracy of railroads and steamship lines that for years, by their influence in these Halls, have prevented the building of the canal while they imposed their tolls and exactions upon American commerce. The grip the Government has on the situation is in the "free tolls," which these same interests now wish repealed.

The canal was built for the very purpose of securing a great commercial advantage to all nations in time of peace, and to ourselves, in case of war, a great military and naval advantage, which we will abandon if we comply with the demands of the President and of Great Britain.

Mr. Speaker, this question has already been passed upon by the American people as deliberately and as carefully as any other question ever considered by them.

The Progressive Party platform declared for free tolls, and 4,200,000 voters indorsed it.

The Democratic platform, indorsed by 6,300,000 voters, declared for the same thing.

Woodrow Wilson, as the candidate of his party, declared repeatedly for free tolls.

A Democratic House, responsive to public sentiment, enacted the free-tolls law.

A Republican Senate passed the bill and a Republican President signed it.

The President and Congressmen elected on the Democratic platform have loudly boasted that they were commissioned by the people to carry out the promises of that platform as a sacred trust.

To the amazement of the country, like a thunderclap out of a clear sky, comes the declaration of the President that the platform of the Democratic Party, the free-tolls promise and his own speeches in favor of it, the Congress that enacted the law, and the 11,000,000 voters who indorsed free tolls in their party platform, are all wrong, and that "free tolls" are a violation of good morals.

Why this remarkable change of heart? President Wilson gives no reason.

The Democrats in Congress, scuttling like rats to get away from a sinking ship, are throwing somersaults to get away from their platform promises.

Do they give any reasons? Verily, they do, and a most sufficient (?) reason—for Democrats—the party boss has issued his orders.

The President doubtless has some reason for this remarkable "flop," but he has not chosen to say what it is. Supreme in his primacy as a Democrat and confident that he is able to do all the thinking necessary in the Democratic Party, he simply issues his orders—

Theirs not to reason why;
Theirs but to do and die.

Democrats are expected to do what they are told and ask no questions.

Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House who desire to vote intelligently on the subject, anxious to find a reason for complying with the President's demand "that, right or wrong," the free-tolls law shall be repealed find nothing but the innuendo that if it is not done grave and unfortunate complications will arise.

For many years the United States Government has repeatedly announced her definite policy to be in favor of arbitration.

So far as professions could go, we have urged arbitration upon all the nations.

In my opinion here is a case, and now is the time to prove our good faith. But a Democratic committee of this House has introduced a rule which prohibits all amendments and prevents the House even from considering a proposition to arbitrate the question of our right to establish free tolls.

So Democrats and Progressives, groping in the dark for some reason for the repudiation of their party platforms, are obliged to go afield; and what do they find?

They find that the grave situation in Mexico threatens graver complications.

The Mexican policy of the President may fail. Some form of intervention may be necessary and appears now to be imminent.

In that case Japan, in conspiracy with Huerta, may renew her attempts to get a footing in the Magdalena Bay country, and thus bring the "Monroe doctrine" to a test of military strength.

In view of such a contingency it would be of advantage to secure the good offices of Great Britain, with her ally Japan, to prevent trouble.

From the days of our national weakness and infancy, through the stress of civil war, we have supported the Monroe doctrine for 93 years. In the face of the world we have maintained our rights and independence everywhere and always; but in these days of our incomparable power, daunted by disturbing conditions in Mexico, we are advised to purchase British influence by the abject and unnecessary surrender of the most powerful strategic commercial and military position in the world—the control of the Panama Canal—and we are asked to do it "ungrudgingly" and without a reason.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the only rational explanation of the President's action, and the situation in Mexico is naturally interjected into this debate. I have made some observations thereon, in which I counseled the Members of this House to stand by the President in his Mexican policy, without regard to party, so long as there remained a hope that it might succeed. I believe he is trying to avert war, and every sentiment of my being sympathizes with his efforts, though I fear that he will be obliged to try some other plan than his "watchful-waiting" policy.

I did not then and I do not now question the motives of the President of the United States, but I am doubtful of the wisdom of his Mexican policy. There is not a vestige of a doubt in my mind that in regard to this question of tolls he is in error now.

I believe him to be in error in the methods he uses to accomplish his purposes.

Neither the people nor Congress are taken into his confidence, and Congress is demanded to break party pledges, to abrogate their function as a legislative body and to leap in the dark at his command. The dignity of the office, my respect for Woodrow Wilson, and self-respect forbid that I take part in ill-natured or partisan criticism of the President of the United States, but I left the Republican Party because the arrogance and intolerance and corruption of the "boss system" had become insupportable, and I am bound to say that never was a party more completely bossed than the Democratic Party is to-day—an honest boss, thank God; a well-meaning boss, I am convinced; a beneficent boss, if you please; but a boss nevertheless who, sufficient unto himself, confident in the honesty and wisdom of his own judgment, has practically usurped the legislative functions and reduced the great Democratic majority of the House to mere registrars of his opinions, which, right or wrong, without assignment of reason, are to be adopted.

I do not approve the methods by which this legislation is sought to be accomplished, nor do I believe that the President consults American sentiment or moral obligations in his demand that Congress should repeal the law granting free passage through the Panama Canal of our coastwise traffic. [Applause.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

CENSUS OF TULSA, OKLA.

Mr. OWEN. I report back favorably, without amendment, from the Committee on the Census the bill (S. 4601) to authorize the Director of the Census to enumerate the population of the city of Tulsa, State of Oklahoma. It is a very short bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if there is any real hurry for the passage of the bill?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; there is. The prestige of a town depends upon its size. Tulsa has doubled in size within the last two years. There are now probably 30,000 people in it, whereas the census gives it only about 16,000 or 18,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to lose any time that could be given to the calendar, but I shall object to any further request of the kind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask what is the necessity for re-enumerating the inhabitants of the city of Tulsa, Okla.?

Mr. OWEN. The city of Tulsa can not be a reserve city, for example, according to the census, because a population of 25,000 is necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Might not that apply to a hundred other cities in the country?

Mr. OWEN. It is a general law, of course; but this town has doubled in population, and desires that fact to be made known and that it be placed in the position which it is entitled to hold.

Mr. GALLINGER. A great many other towns have doubled in population since 1910. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 311, submitted by Mr. LEA of Tennessee on the 24th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

AWARDS IN PLAZA CASES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) relating to the awards and payments thereon in what are commonly known as the Plaza cases, and I submit a report (No. 387) thereon. I should like to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a measure which refers to the Plaza cases, commonly called.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, if it goes on the calendar, we are in hopes of reaching it to-day. I do not think there will be any objection to it when it is reached in its order. I have given notice that I would object to the consideration of any further bills when reported this morning, and I therefore object to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go on the calendar.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COAL LAND LEASES.

Mr. JONES. I have an article prepared by T. P. McDonald on the leasing of coal lands in the United States and other countries, which I desire to have printed as a public document. I ask that the article may be referred to the Committee on Printing for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over from a preceding day:

The SECRETARY. Motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the motion may go over for the day without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it goes over without prejudice.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 316, submitted yesterday by Mr. LEWIS, as follows:

Be it resolved by the United States Senate, That in pursuance of the true American doctrine of equal and exact justice to all, special privilege to none, that it is expedient and just that all vessels or tonnage passing through the Panama Canal shall bear and a pay a sum of compensation so adjusted as shall compensate for expense and upkeep of the canal.

That the amount and method of payment of such tolls shall be regulated jointly by the Secretaries of War and the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer a substitute for the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire offers a substitute, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That in pursuance of the true American doctrine that American interests are safer in the hands of Americans than in the hands of European or other foreign nations, it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States can grant free passage through the Panama Canal to American coastwise vessels and that any attempted denial of that right by European or other foreign powers is an unwarranted demand on their part, which can not be conceded without a surrender of rights that lie at the foundation of our Government and which American interests and American honor demand shall be maintained at all hazards.

Resolved further, That there is neither necessity nor justice in repealing the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act, the purpose of the exemption being to aid American shipping in its unequal contest with the subsidized shipping of other countries, which will probably include the payment of tolls by those Governments on their vessels passing through the canal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there seems to be some apparent conflict between the two resolutions. I notice that they are slightly inconsistent with each other. The first one which was read, coming over from a previous day, if I caught the name of the Senator who introduced it aright, was submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I do not see that Senator upon the floor now, though he may be within call for aught I know. I have had no communication from him, but in his absence it seems to me it would be hardly courteous to the mover of the resolution, upon which he may want to address the Senate, to take it up. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution, together with the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, may go over without prejudice until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will go over without prejudice. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I request unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator, before unanimous consent is granted——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I very reluctantly object to the request. I think we had better get to the calendar until 2 o'clock, and after that we can take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Is there not unfinished buiness to come up at 2 o'clock?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is.

Mr. WARREN. If we take up the calendar until 2 o'clock, and then take up the regular business, it will cut out the appropriation bill for to-day.

I should like the Senator to consider the situation, that with the differences to compose in these bills, there ought to be some consideration given to the importance of getting them into the hands of the conferees as early as possible. I hope the Senator will not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think we are at all pressed for time just at this moment, and we might as well go ahead with the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would it be agreeable to the Senator to continue the consideration of the calendar, unless we can complete it sooner, until 1 o'clock?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I intend later to make a request for unanimous consent for the purpose of getting a decent consideration of the calendar, and that would carry it up to 2 o'clock. I give notice now that at the proper time I shall ask unanimous consent that the calendar be taken up, and that when taken up all bills unobjected to shall be considered, and then the bills which have been objected to shall be taken up in their order on the calendar and considered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I assumed that the rule heretofore followed by the Senate was to grant appropriation bills the right of way, and I shall insist on taking up the Army appropriation bill. In this connection I desire to say that inasmuch as there is unfinished business pending before the Senate which is likely to be disposed of to-day, at 2 o'clock I will ask that the Army appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside. In the meantime, however, I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of this appropriation bill, and I move, if objection is made, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13453, making appropriations for the support of the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion is not in order. From the somewhat extended reading of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the Chair has made, it appears that it has been the custom of the Senate to give the right of way to appropriation bills, but there is no rule which makes a motion to take them up privileged until the hour of 2 o'clock shall have arrived.

Mr. WARREN. What about the hour of 1 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an absolute inhibition against taking up any bill before the hour of 1 o'clock, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the fact that we are already in default on one of the appropriation bills by this delay. Some of the Senate clerks are waiting for pay; the Panama Canal fund is exhausted, so that the operatives can not be paid until we complete one of the appropriation bills that is now in conference. As we have to fit our time on the Senate side with that of the House, these delays are bound to follow. It seems to me that there ought to be consideration given to the appropriation bills, so as to get them along to where the differences can be encountered one by one and surmounted, which can not be done if we put them off until everything else has been taken care of. I think the Senator ought to let the appropriation bill in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is nothing in the appropriation bill that will obviate the difficulty the Senator suggests. We are not pushed for time, and I think it is better to pursue the regular order.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

The bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress was announced as first in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that this bill take its place on the calendar, under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if the amendment to that bill agreed to in committee has been accepted by the Senate?

Mr. STERLING. It has not been accepted by the Senate. I will say that the amendment was sent to the Secretary's desk when this bill was reached on the call of the calendar the other day, and at that time the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] proposed an amendment to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the committee amendment as amended a new section, to be known as section 2, to read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all lands reserved as timber lands or for other purposes within diminished Indian reservations shall be open to mineral entry and location under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That upon every producing mine developed thereon the Secretary of the Interior shall levy and collect a reasonable royalty at a rate to be fixed by him, the proceeds thereof to be paid into the tribal funds of the Indians for whose benefit said reservation was made.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. WARREN. Let that resolution go over, Mr. President.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let that resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 26) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the absence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who reported the joint resolution adversely from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, I think the joint resolution ought to go over. I myself have no objection to it. The Senator from Utah objected to its consideration on yesterday.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am the author of the joint resolution. I recognize, of course, that it can not be debated within the rule now governing the present consideration of the calendar, but I give notice that at the first convenient opportunity I intend to call the attention of the Senate to the joint resolution and ask that it be considered. Meanwhile I am quite willing that the resolution shall go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

The bill (S. 3863) granting lands to Hot Springs Lodge, No. 62, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, of Hot Springs, Ark., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the bill go over.

The bill (S. 3023) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the bill go over. I wish to say, however, that I shall not object to its being considered the next time it is reached in the consideration of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 4352) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. THOMAS. Is this the bill the Senate had under consideration on yesterday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the bill which was considered by the Senate on yesterday. Is there objection to its present consideration? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the amendment yesterday offered by Mr. BRYAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to have the Secretary state the substance of the lines proposed to be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, it is proposed to strike out from line 3 to line 6, inclusive, as follows:

The name of Louise Amy, widow of Simon Amy, late of Companies I and C, Eighty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has any reason been given why that provision should be stricken out? The item was inserted by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was discussed in full yesterday, and the Chair assumes that the Senate is advised regarding it. The pension is put in for a widow who has married a soldier since June 27, 1890.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not ask the Chair to explain it. Is there any member of the committee in charge of the bill on the floor?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I made the motion to strike out the clause because it is in violation of the law. The law provides that no widow of a soldier married subsequent to June 27, 1890, is eligible to a pension. This bill provides for paying a pension to a widow married since that date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] to the name of Ferdinand Litz, at the bottom of page 5, which the Secretary has just read. If I remember correctly, the soldier has since died.

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes. I move that the clause on page 5, including lines 23 and 24, and lines 1 and 2, on page 6, be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 it is proposed to strike out lines 23 and 24, and on page 6 to strike out lines 1 and 2, as follows:

Ferdinand Litz, late of Company H, Fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move to strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, at the top of page 7, the proposed beneficiary having died since the bill was reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 7, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Martha A. Medbery, widow of Alpheus F. Medbery, late of Company D, Twentieth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to strike out lines 13 to 16, inclusive, on page 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 12, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Elizabeth A. Forknall, widow of William Forknall, late of Company L, First Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. It appears from the report of the committee, on page 14, Mr. President, that—

The claimant applied for pension as the soldier's widow, and her application was rejected on the ground that she could not prove a lawful marriage to soldier prior to June 27, 1890, by proving the death or divorce before that time of a former husband.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to strike out lines 5 to 8, inclusive, on page 18.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, after line 4, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Christina Mitchell, widow of Charles Mitchell, late of Company F, Second Regiment, and Company D, First Regiment, Louisiana Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. The extract from the report of the committee on the subject which I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate is as follows:

The claimant was married to the soldier on July 18, 1891.

That was subsequent to the act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I merely want to observe that one of the reasons why cases like this are brought to the attention of the committee is that the pension or increase of pension could not be allowed under the general law. Certainly the fact that a pension is not allowable under the general law is of itself no reason for its rejection here. Just because the relief is not possible under the general law the special case comes here.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I want, in answer to that argument of the chairman of the committee, to call his attention to the eighth rule of the Committee on Pensions, which is supposed to guide Senators in introducing pension bills, and is supposed to settle the rights of those who contemplate applying for a special pension. If there is to be one rule for one Senator and another rule for another, I think the Senate ought to know it. If there is to be a rule published by the committee for the information of those making application for a pension, and that rule states that they are not eligible, and then some few can come in and get pensions, I think it is time for the Senate to know it. The provision to which I refer comes under rule 8, which quotes the acts of Congress providing that, in order to be eligible to receive a pension, a widow must have been married to her soldier husband prior to June 27, 1890.

The Senator from Indiana says: "Why, these people would not apply for a pension if they could get it under the general law." As I understand, that was not the purpose of the establishment of the Committee on Pensions. It has been established, as stated in the rules of the committee, to deal with hard cases, with meritorius cases, where the amount allowed is not sufficient; but not to repeal general acts of Congress and place upon the pension roll those who can not get upon it under the general acts of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this case is a little different from the Amy case. The soldier not only fought in the Civil War but he was in the Regular Army for a great many years after the Civil War, and a pension was allowed him by the Commissioner of Pensions. He died of uremia October 26, 1910. The widow shortly afterwards made application for a pension, claiming that the disease from which her husband died was contracted in the line of service. If that were true, then, of course, she would be entitled to a pension; but the department held that the evidence submitted by the widow was not sufficiently strong to show that the soldier's death was due to service origin. After reading the testimony, including the affidavits of the doctors, the committee thought the soldier did die from a disease contracted in the line of service. I believe, Mr. President, that that is why this particular case has been reported in this bill. I will admit, Mr. President, that she did marry the soldier after June 27, 1890, but that is the reason this is put in. It was not the reason in the Amy case.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has stated the law correctly when he says that if the death of the soldier was of service origin it is immaterial whether his widow was married to him either before or after June 27, 1890. Then we come to the question whether his death was of service origin.

Mr. President, we have a Bureau of Pensions, among whose duties is the duty of ascertaining that fact. In this case the widow went to the Bureau of Pensions; and the Bureau of Pensions, established by law for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not her husband's death was of service origin, decided that it was not. Now, who contradicts that? Some friendly physician; some big-hearted neighbors, who would say: "Oh, the old man probably died because of service in the war, 40 years ago. To be sure, he lived until 1910; but perhaps his service caused it."

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not deny that the physician's affidavit was presented to the committee showing that the soldier died from disease contracted in the Army?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, that affidavit, in all probability, was submitted to the bureau we have established by law for the purpose of ascertaining the merits of these cases.

Mr. SMOOT. That, of course, I can not say.

Mr. BRYAN. I would rather trust an impartial bureau established by law for the purpose of ascertaining disputed facts than I would an ex parte affidavit, where the Government has no opportunity to be represented, and the generous disposition of the clerk who writes the report.

The Committee on Pensions, in a note preceding the rules, notifies these people who have it in mind to apply for pensions that the committee is not established to repeal existing law, that the committee is not established for the purpose of adding to the pension rolls those who can not get there under any of the many provisions of acts of Congress.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRYAN. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I was not present yesterday when the Amy case was discussed. If I remember correctly, I introduced a bill to pension this person.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not know by whom it was introduced.

Mr. WORKS. I have been quite careful to investigate these claims myself and to assure myself in advance that they are meritorious claims for pensions before introducing the bills. I think it will be found upon investigation of the facts that the claim of Mrs. Amy is a meritorious claim, and that, independently of the rule of law that is appealed to now, that pension should have been granted. In that view I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether it has been usually held by the committee, where one comes within the law controlling the Pension Department, that the same rule of law is applied in the committee and the right to a pension denied on that account?

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, of course if these cases came within what Senators are pleased to call the rule of law, they would not be here.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SHIVELY. No; I am not mistaken. The Senator is assuming a good deal when he assumes that everybody is mistaken on this question. It is because these are special and exceptional cases that they appear in this bill.

Mr. BRYAN. I will let the Senator speak in his own time, if he feels that way about it.

Mr. SHIVELY. Very well.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, it has always been my understanding that these special pensions were granted for the very reason that they could not be granted under the general pension laws. If that is not true, I think we had better change the law on the subject, and trust to the Senate, so that the matter may be thoroughly understood. I am quite sure that a great many pensions have been granted of precisely the kind proposed to be granted to Mrs. Amy, and it is unfortunate that the rule should be changed in a case so meritorious as I think this one is.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to know whether the Senate wishes the Chair to enforce the five-minute rule in the discussion of this bill? The Chair is not going to enforce it unless some Senator requests its enforcement.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana says that these special cases are only those in which no relief could be had under general law; in other words, that we add classes of pensioners that are ineligible under some statute. The Senator may be right about that. I did not mean any reflection upon him when I said I thought he was mistaken. He is mistaken, according to the rules of his committee; and I will read the note published for the information of the Senate and of those who want pensions:

The Pension Committees of the two Houses of Congress were created to consider a very few claims in which, from their peculiar circumstances of extreme disability and destitution, adequate relief could not be obtained from the bureau.

The bureau can not make a law. The bureau can not place on the pension rolls some person who could not be placed there under the law—and also to consider a limited number of claims, some of which were necessarily rejected by the bureau for the reason that they were not covered by any existing law, while others were rejected upon legal or medical technicalities which Congress could properly set aside as a matter of equity and justice. It was not the intention to have Congress flooded with pension bills, as of late years has been the case, but simply to afford a means of relief to the very needy and deserving, who, by reason of military services rendered and hardships and sacrifices endured in the time of the country's need, have merited a full share of gratitude. Nor is it the policy of the Government to provide full support for soldiers or their widows, but solely to prevent absolute want, and it is believed, therefore, that private pension legislation should be restricted to cases of such extreme destitution as renders assistance imperative and to cases of exigency or exceptional character which differentiates them from the bulk of cases in which relief is provided by the existing general laws.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BRYAN. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to inquire the date of the rules from which the Senator is reading.

Mr. BRYAN. They are the rules published in the Sixty-second Congress. They are just the same now.

Mr. THOMAS. Were these rules originally adopted in the Sixty-second Congress?

Mr. BRYAN. No; I think the same rules have been in force for a number of years.

Mr. SHIVELY. I will say that new rules are now under consideration and in process of formulation by the committees of both Houses.

Mr. BRYAN (reading)—

Unfortunately the primary and essential purpose of the Pension Committees of Congress has been lost sight of, and there seems to be a prevalent opinion that it is proper to bring every sort of claim, either for original pension or increase of pension, to the attention of Congress, and in many instances the Bureau of Pensions and the existing general laws are wholly ignored.

If it was the intention to ignore them, why place that as one of the conditions for the consideration of a bill? It is news to me that it has been the intention of this committee to consider only those cases which are not covered by the general law or by some statute.

In recent years this practice has grown to such an extent that the Pension Committees of both Houses are burdened with an increasing flood of bills, many of which, on account of their great volume, no consideration whatever can be given for the want of time and opportunity. For the purpose of endeavoring to prevent the numerous introduction of bills which can not receive favorable action, and to largely decrease the number of bills presented to them for consideration, thus enabling them to give their sole attention to cases of exceptional merit and need, the committee have adopted the following code of rules—

And so forth.

One of those rules is that if a widow was married to her soldier husband subsequently to June 27, 1890, the committee will not consider her case, unless the death of the soldier was due to service. So, Mr. President, in making the motion to strike from the bill the item for the benefit of the beneficiary therein named, I am doing so in pursuance of statutes which Congress has passed, and in pursuance of the rules the committees of both Houses have adopted. If it is not to be followed, it is well to know that these rules do not mean anything.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have been a member of the Committee on Pensions for nearly 15 years, and think I am fairly well acquainted with the rules of the committee, as well as its general method of procedure and the extent to which the rules that have been read have been regarded as law by the committee.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that in the beginning of the introduction of these private pension bills, which were then very few and very far between, there was no necessity for any rule whatever; but after they came in so rapidly that it practically converted the Committee on Pensions into a bureau of pensions it was necessary, in order that equal justice might be accorded to each applicant, that some rule should guide the committee. That was the object of adopting the rules. We adopted them a number of years ago, because they were necessary to guide us. It never had been regarded, of course, that the rules laid down by us would have the effect of a statutory law, but they should have great effect and great consideration.

When we passed the law of June 27, 1890, providing for pensions to all widows, irrespective of the cause of the death of their husbands, we limited the pensions to those who had been married prior to the date at which that law became effective; in other words, prior to June 27, 1890. That was merely an arbitrary date. Nevertheless, because there were so very many cases outside of that law, and because that had been regarded by Congress as a proper line of demarcation between those who had married previously and those who had married afterwards, we have followed that rule quite closely, and have regarded it necessary to insert it in our rules. Like other rules, however, it has not been followed rigidly. In other words, if the marriage took place, we will say, a short time after that, so that there was really no distinction—one widow might have been married on the 28th of June, 1890, and another on the 1st of July, a difference of only two days—where the record otherwise would have justified the committee in granting the pension, they have waived the portion of the rule and of the law which prohibited the granting of a pension to a widow where the marriage took place subsequent to June 27, 1890. So it may be said that the rule to-day in that committee, as it has been enforced, is that where the exigencies are great, and the time elapsing between June 27, 1890, and the time of the marriage is not very material, where the marriage was close to that date, we have resolved in favor of allowing the pension.

We have another rule, for instance, which is that after a pension has been granted by special bill the committee will not consider another claim for a special bill for the same person; but we have gradually modified that to mean simply that we will not do so unless considerable time has elapsed and great changes have taken place in the financial or physical condition, or both. So in every instance the committee has tried to make its rules just and reasonable, and it has gone a little to this side or that side of the line of demarcation to work out justice as nearly as possible.

I call attention to the fact that in this case the soldier served all through the Civil War, from 1861 to 1865, and also served in the Regular Army. In this instance the committee undoubtedly thought that the difference of about one year after the 27th of June, 1890, under all the circumstances, should be waived, and that this woman, then in the poorhouse, as I understand from the record, should be granted a little relief to the extent of $12 a month.

I state this simply to indicate what has been the course of the committee. I think the Senator from Florida will agree that, as chairman of the committee, I tried to hold just about as closely as possible to the letter of the rule, but we have not bound ourselves absolutely by it as though it were a law.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I will say that I believe the Senator has undoubtedly undertaken to conform to the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890, and not to include in these special pension bills widows married subsequently to that date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 8 I move to strike out lines 17 to 20, inclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8 strike out lines 17 to 20, inclusive, in the following words:

The name of Mary A. Solter, widow of Samuel W. Solter, late of Company K, Thirteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. It appears from the report that—

When claimant filed her claim in the Pension Bureau she was called upon for proof of the divorce of her former husband, but she was unable after much effort to furnish record evidence of the same. It appears, however, that she married the soldier innocently, believing she had a right to do so, and lived with him as a faithful wife for nearly 38 years. She was recognized by soldier as his lawful wife in his reply to marriage circular from the Pension Bureau and was so recognized in the community in which they lived. These are the facts as shown by the evidence.

Mr. President, it is invidious to make an objection to specific items in the bill, and especially upon the ground that these items are opposed to the general statute relating to the subject, because the same objection from the examination which I have made of the report would lie against much the larger percentage of the individual instances which the bill covers.

It will readily be seen from a consideration of the rule which was just laid down by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] and the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], who has had a large experience in these matters, that the practice which originated in the entertainment of special bills of this character, and which was designed to cover exceptional and meritorious cases not included within or which could be brought within the general purview of the statute on the subject, has been so completely departed from that now the bulk of the bills introduced in the two Houses—perhaps I am stating it too broadly—but a very large proportion of the bills introduced in the two Houses are special bills of this character. In consequence, the Congress of the United States has become a court of appeals to which all claims rejected under the provisions of the general statute are brought, and as time passes, of course the number increases.

Mr. President, as I said yesterday, if this movement was one embraced in a statute for the general purpose of including all those now indigent who served in the war for the Union and the widows of those who so served, I do not think that I would oppose it, but I believe that it is the duty of this Congress to place due limitation upon this general custom of disregarding the general law by the introduction of special bills and the allowance of special pensions, except, of course, in those exceptional and meritorious cases which appeal not only to the sympathy but to the sense of justice of the country.

Hence, in making these objections, I am not attempting to single out any specific line of application, but merely for the purpose of emphasizing some of those which it is clearly beyond the power of Congress to allow if they are going to profess any regard for the existing statutes.

Mr. President, some time ago I ran over a number of these bills, I forget just how many, to determine the extent to which the pension rolls will be increased. Of course, I refer to the added appropriations that are necessary to carry out the purpose of these bills if they should become a law. I found that on Order of Business 141, to and including Order of Business 179, the total added appropriations of these aggregate $76,815. I hear some one say, "That is a very small amount of money for a great Nation to haggle over when it is to be applied to a beneficent purpose."

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question? I do not know that I understood him correctly. Does the Senator state that the pensions that are granted by those bills aggregate that sum per annum?

Mr. THOMAS. My calculation, made somewhat hurriedly and based upon Calendar Nos. 140, 141, 167, 168, 177, 178, and 179——

Mr. McCUMBER. This is the particular question I wanted to present to the Senator: In making the computation, has the Senator simply computed the amount that is granted, or has he taken into consideration merely the excess over the previous appropriation?

Mr. THOMAS. The excess.

Mr. REED. How much is it?

Mr. THOMAS. It is $76,815 per annum. That is the annual increase, subject, of course, to the mortality which will occur in the course of time and diminish the list accordingly.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me right here, because it is just in connection with what he is speaking about, the facts established by the records of the department show that all of the increases granted by private bills are more than offset by the deaths of those who were drawing pensions under private pension legislation, so that at the end of the year, if you will take the number of those who died to whom special pensions have been granted, you will find that the saving to the Government by reason of death is in all instances considerably more than the amount which we have granted.

Mr. SHIVELY rose.

Mr. THOMAS. Yet that is not a justification for this line of legislation if the legislation itself be unjustifiable. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SHIVELY. The observation the Senator just made may render the suggestion that I was about to make inappropriate. He will observe that in a vast majority of these cases, whether of men or women, the beneficiaries are very old. The mortality among them is very great. This accounts for the facts stated by the Senator from North Dakota. Even in the time between the reporting of a bill to the Senate and the calling of it on the calendar we have two or three or four amendments to strike out because of the death of the soldier or the widow in the meantime.

Mr. THOMAS. I have observed that, Mr. President, and I think I stated yesterday that it is the appeal which old age and poverty and suffering make to the average legislator much more than the merits of the case which makes so many of these applications successful. I acknowledge and pay tribute to the existence of that virtue and commend its exercise, but I do not believe, as I also said yesterday, that it should interfere with or influence us in our action as legislators where the result is going to be an increased appropriation. I do not believe, notwithstanding the mortality which is inevitable to old age, that the annual general appropriation for pensions is decreasing.

Mr. SHIVELY. Of course there was an increase last year, but there will be a decrease of from $12,000,000 to $13,000,000 this year in the general appropriation.

Mr. THOMAS. There will be unless there is additional general legislation, which is coming all the time.

I know it is not popular for a man to oppose the granting of pensions. It takes a great deal more courage here to make a charge upon the British Lion than it does to repel an assault upon the Treasury of the United States. But, Mr. President, if our platform means anything, and I insist it does, we should apply the principle of economy all along the line and make added appropriations only where it is absolutely essential that we should do so. We have charged the Republican Party with profligate extravagance, and in that connection we made a corresponding pledge for an economic administration of governmental affairs. If there has been any exhibition of a desire to carry out that pledge, I have not seen it on the floor of the Senate. Indeed, Mr. President, the short experience I have had here has taught me that the restraints which are supposed to be placed upon expenditures after appropriations are made are very seldom regarded or observed, for every department comes here every session, first with an urgent and then with a general deficiency bill, and we are obliged to make increased appropriations because of those conditions, when if they were held down as they should be to the limitations placed by Congress in the appropriations made from year to year there would be less of this deficiency and less of public waste.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that these special pension bills look rather more important than they really are when considered in relation to the amount of money that is necessary to pay them. Has the Senator any idea about what is the average amount added to the pension appropriations by reason of these bills yearly?

Mr. THOMAS. I have not, Mr. President. I accept the Senator's statement on that point. He has been upon the committee for a great many years.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that for the last 10 years it would probably average a quarter of a million dollars a year. I think the high-water mark was reached two years ago. I think it ran a little over $500,000 additional for one year. That was when we were in session almost the entire year.

Mr. THOMAS. That would be over two and one-half million dollars for 10 years.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. It would average a little more than that possibly during the last 10 years when we take into consideration the amount that was appropriated in two years—I think in 1910 or 1911, or about that time. So the Senator will see that after all it does not add so very greatly to the pension appropriations.

Mr. THOMAS. I apprehend if the amount was $250,000 a year upon the average for the last 10 years of Republican rule, and I can judge by the way ours will be, we are going to increase it to about $350,000 or $400,000 this year; but if the aggregate is two and one-half million dollars, that is an enormous sum of money even for the United States.

While I have no expectation of stemming the tide by challenging the continued allowance of these measures and consequently of increased appropriations, for I am sorry to say that I observe no active indication of cooperation or support on this side of the Chamber, I feel it my duty to record my protest against this method of appropriation, notwithstanding the fact that it will probably avail nothing.

I am not going, Mr. President, to filibuster against any of these measures. I never filibustered in my life. I do not know just how to go about it. I do not believe in it as a general proposition, although I admit its efficacy in certain crises of great exigency or emergency.

I ask for a vote if nothing further is to be said on my motion to amend.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to strike out lines 16 to 20 on page 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19 strike out lines 16 to 20, inclusive, in the following words:

The name of Calvin W. Birg, alias Calvin W. Burton, late of Company D, Sixty-fifth Regiment, and Company D, One hundred and twentieth Regiment, Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. THOMAS. My motion is based on the report of the committee on page 23, where it appears that the application of Mr. Birg for a pension under the general law was rejected for the reason that he could not furnish the necessary evidence to prove the service origin of his disabilities.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 14 I move to strike out lines 1, 2, and 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14 strike out lines 1, 2, and 3, in the following words:

The name of Alice M. David, widow of Daniel H. David, late major, Fourteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. The report of the committee upon this claim is that the claimant was married to the soldier on the 9th day of February, 1891, some months subsequent to the time fixed by the general statute under which pensions to widows can be allowed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to strike out lines 13 to 16, on page 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, strike out lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, in the following words:

The name of Sarah B. Beardsley, former widow of David B. Turner, late of Company L, First Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. I read from page 39 of the report:

Claimant was married to soldier August 8, 1859, a few years before the war. She was granted pension under the act of June 27, 1890, certificate No. 464912, at $8 per month, which she drew until October 20, 1901, when she forfeited same by remarriage to one Alfred Beardsley, who died January 13, 1911.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 17 I move to strike out lines 5 to 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 strike out lines 5 to 9, inclusive, in the following words:

The name of Eliza A. Clark, widow of George E. Clark, late of Company E, One hundred and fourteenth Regiment, and Company A, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 44 of the report it appears that this claimant was married to the ex-soldier January 14, 1891. Her application for a pension under the general law was rejected because the ex-soldier's death was not from cause of service origin, and she has no pensionable status under the acts of June 27, 1890, and April 19, 1908, on account of her having married the ex-soldier subsequent to the former date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the last item in the bill called to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], lines 5 to 8, on page 18, is one in which the marriage was subsequent to June 27, 1890. I propose to move in the Senate to strike out the clause from line 5 to 8, inclusive, on page 18. If the Senate should refuse to do that, I do not see why the Senate should not go back and restore the item they did strike out, where the widow was married since June 27, 1890. If it be not the will of the Senate to agree to my amendment, then I propose to move to restore the other name, because I am not here to take part as between these people. So I now move that the clause from line 5 to line 8, inclusive, on page 18, be stricken from the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], but I am informed that if he were present he would vote the same way that I intend to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I inquire if the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I have learned that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], with whom I am paired, has not voted. I therefore desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] is unavoidably absent from the Senate, as is also the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. The senior Senator from Kentucky has a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], and the junior Senator from Utah has a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. WARREN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 38, as follows:

So Mr. BRYAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will not renew my motions in the Senate in view of this vote, because it demonstrates, if any proof were needed, that the pension is mightier than the sword. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, on yesterday I called attention to the fact that a pension was being granted to a widow married in 1892. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] joined with me in the belief that it ought to be stricken from the bill. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stated that he did not know of any others in this bill in like situation. Going hurriedly through the bill, I found another one, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has found three others. It is a peculiar proposition to me that an hour ago it was the sense of the Senate that the item granting a pension to Louise

Amy should be stricken from the bill and that now it has reversed its position and is in favor of going on record as willing to pay pensions to widows who married their soldier husbands subsequent to June 27, 1890. I should like to have the record a little more consistent than that for myself.

I stated, Mr. President, that I intended, if my amendment was voted down, to move to reinstate the claim that was stricken out about an hour ago; but I would very much prefer that some other Senator should do that, and I invite the chairman of the committee to do it, because my position has not been changed, although the Senate has changed its position.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. BRYAN. So I think that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] or the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] ought to move now that we reverse ourselves and nonconcur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, so as to put the name of Louise Amy back in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think there is a little difference between the Amy case and those that have already been voted upon. In the Army case there was no evidence whatever before the committee showing that the soldier died from disease due to service origin. There has been evidence submitted to the Committee on Pensions showing in the other cases that the soldier did die from wounds incurred or disease contracted in the service.

Mr. BRYAN. Each of the cases, Mr. President, went to the Bureau of Pensions, and the bureau decided that question. We do not know upon what evidence the cases were decided, and it is a violent presumption to say that they were decided erroneously.

Mr. SMOOT. I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that the papers in the Amy case do not show that the Pension Bureau decided the case at all; she came directly to Congress, while in the other cases the claims did go to the Bureau of Pensions.

Mr. BRYAN. In each of these other cases?

Mr. SMOOT. In each of the other cases; and the bureau turned them down. When the claimants submitted their cases before the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, they all presented affidavits from doctors showing that the soldiers died from disease contracted in the line of service. Now, I want the Senator to mark that difference between these cases. That is the only difference that I can see.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; and that is a very shadowy difference; but perhaps that will do; it is the best we can do to justify the reversal of the Senate within 40 minutes on this question.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13453, being the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. REED. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was rejected by the Senate. I am willing that the motion now made shall be laid on the table, to be called up hereafter by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] at his convenience. I enter the motion, and ask that it be temporarily laid on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Has not the joint resolution been rejected by a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate?

Mr. REED. It has been rejected, and I am moving to reconsider the vote whereby it was defeated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask on what date the Senate voted upon it, the object of the inquiry being to find out whether the two days in which such a motion can be made have elapsed?

Mr. NELSON. They have not elapsed; this is the second day.

Mr. REED. Of course, if they have elapsed, and I enter the motion out of time, it will have no validity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote whereby the joint resolution was rejected was taken on the 25th of March.

Mr. REED. You exclude the first day and include the last, I believe, in the count.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was rejected by a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. REED. And I voted with the prevailing side. I now move to reconsider the vote by which Senate joint resolution 41 was defeated. I ask that the motion I have made be allowed to lie on the table temporarily.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator simply gives notice now that he will make that motion.

Mr. REED. I am making the motion; I am entering the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if the motion is made direct to the Senate, it must be acted upon at this time, or some disposition made of it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, my notion has been that a motion of that character can be entered.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can give notice of a motion of that kind, and I thought that was what the Senator was going to do—to give notice to-day that upon to-morrow he will make that motion. Then he would be well within his rights.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if this is going to open up one of our usual parliamentary discussions here, I shall have to decline to yield further. I want to be accommodating to the Senator from Missouri, but I can see a broad field open for discussion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will read the last four lines of section 1 of Rule XIII, which are as follows:

> Every motion to reconsider shall be decided by a majority vote, and may be laid on the table without affecting the question in reference to which the same is made, which shall be a final disposition of the motion.

I think the practice is that a motion of that kind can be made, and then, at the request of the Senator who makes it, it can be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Chair that I know of no rule to that effect. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that I have no disposition whatever to object to what the Senator is trying to reach.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is what the Chair thinks can be done: The Chair thinks the motion to reconsider must be entered to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And the Chair believes that by unanimous consent the vote upon that question may be postponed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I enter the motion, and ask unanimous consent that the vote upon the motion and consideration of it may be postponed until such time as the Senate sees fit to take it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I do not know whether or not it would be agreeable to all the Senators to reconsider it. I thought the Senator was going to divide his motion; that is, to move first that it be reconsidered, and then ask unanimous consent that it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. REED. I did not suppose the Senate would be in the humor, perhaps, to reconsider it; and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] had arranged to have the floor to call up his bill. I simply wanted to enter the motion to save the right of the Senator from Montana to press this matter further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He has 24 hours within which to make the motion.

Mr. REED. The time will expire to-day. I ask unanimous consent now that the motion which I have entered may be laid aside until such time as the Senate shall see fit to consider it.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, under the unanimous-consent agreement, it could only go over one day; could it not, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks we are wasting too much time. The Chair believes the Senator from Missouri has now moved to reconsider the vote; and by unanimous consent it will go over until the morning hour to-morrow, if there is no objection to that course.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, let me make an inquiry. Is it not the custom of the Senate for a Senator within the two days to enter a motion, and then is it not at his discretion as to when he shall call up that motion for the consideration of the Senate? Has not that been the uniform practice?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not answer that question. The Chair does not know.

Mr. REED. I thought so; but I am willing to have it go the other way, if the Senator from Kansas does not object.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] moves to proceed with the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; that the bill be read for amendments; and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection that course will be followed. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Office of the Chief of Staff," on page 2, line 15, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$8,700" and insert, "including $25 per month additional to regular compensation to chief clerk of division for superintendence of the War College Building, $9,000," so as to make the clause read:

Army War College: For expenses of the Army War College, being for the purchase of the necessary stationery; typewriters and exchange of same; office, toilet, and desk furniture; textbooks; books of reference; scientific and professional papers and periodicals; printing and binding; maps; police utensils; employment of temporary, technical, or special services; and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, including $25 per month additional to regular compensation to chief clerk of division for superintendence of the War College Building, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 21, after the word "reference," to strike out "professional and technical" and insert "maps"; in line 22, after the word "newspapers," to insert "drafting and messenger service, and for all other necessary expenses"; on page 3, line 4, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$12,500"; and in line 8, after the word "appropriation," to insert "Provided further, That traveling expenses incurred by the military attachés abroad under orders from the Secretary of War for the fiscal year 1914 shall be paid from the ordinary appropriations for the support of the Army pertaining to the Quartermaster Corps," so as to make the clause read:

Contingencies, Military Information Section, General Staff Corps: For contingent expenses of the Military Information Section, General Staff Corps, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference, maps, periodicals and newspapers, drafting and messenger service, and for all other necessary expenses; and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad; and of the branch office of the Military Information Section at Manila and the actual and necessary traveling expenses incurred by military attachés abroad under orders from the Secretary of War, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $12,500: Provided, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation: Provided further, That traveling expenses incurred by the military attachés abroad under orders from the Secretary of War for the fiscal year 1914 shall be paid from the ordinary appropriations for the support of the Army pertaining to the Quartermaster Corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 11, to insert:

Provided, That the act of Congress approved October 12, 1888, entitled "An act to make enlisted men of the Signal Corps responsible for public property," be amended so as to read that property returns of the Signal Corps shall be rendered semiannually or more often.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to have lines 12 to 24 on page 7, the two paragraphs which have just been agreed to, transposed to follow line 21 on page 6. It is just a question of the order in which the matter shall come. It makes the sense clearer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the proviso beginning with line 12, page 7, and the remainder of the language on that page.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Pay of officers of the line," on page 8, line 8, after the word "line," to strike out "$7,750,000" and insert "$7,839,100," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of officers of the line, $7,839,100.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the chairman of the committee explain the necessity for the increase there over the amount allowed by the House?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amount estimated by the department was based on the actual officers of the line. If there were only $7,750,000 appropriated, it would of necessity leave out a number of officers, and I think it was particularly specified that there would be 53 lieutenants whose pay would not be provided for. In other words, it would necessarily create a deficiency for the year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 8, line 9, before the word "pay," to strike out "For" and insert "Additional"; in the same line, after the word "pay," to strike out "of officers"; and in the same line, after the word "service," to strike out "to be paid with their current monthly pay," so as to make the clause read:

Additional pay for length of service, $1,616,218.27.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay of Enlisted Men," on page 8, line 12, after the word "recruits," to strike out "$16,949,126" and insert "$18,170,884," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of enlisted men of all grades, including recruits, $18,170,884.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the chairman of the committee give us an explanation of that item?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I may state generally that it has been the policy of the Senate committee to follow largely the recommendations which have been made by the Secretary of War and to allow the estimates rather than the amounts which were allowed by the House. The amount allowed by the House Appropriations Committee was apparently based upon what is not the real strength of the Army to-day. The appropriation made by the House was sufficient to pay 74,700 men, while the actual strength of the Army to-day is approximately 85,000 men. In other words, not to have appropriated the amount estimated for by the Secretary of War would have left these other men unprovided for.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I make a statement right there?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Even last year there was a deficiency of over $3,000,000 in the pay of the soldiers, for which the Appropriations Committee is now called upon to provide.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not any question but that these men who have enlisted and who are now serving in the Army either must be paid or their services must be dispensed with in some way, either by discharge or otherwise.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I should like to say that to-day the actual number of enlisted men in the Army is 85,694, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the reason of the increase. It is to provide for the men actually in the service rather than for an arbitrary estimate of 74,700 men.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the chairman of the committee know what reason prompted the House committee in providing an inadequate amount for the number of men enlisted in the Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I really do not know, because the hearings before the House committee showed practically what the hearings before the Senate committee showed, that these men are actually in the service; and I think it is the policy of the War Department and the policy of the President to keep the Army up to the authorized strength of 85,000 men. If the present plans of the War Department are carried out, and troops are transferred to the Philippine Islands, to the Sandwich Islands, and to the Panama Canal—and I may say to the Senator that troops are being transferred to those points—it will leave in this country, for its own protection, only about 32,000 men. So, with the estimated strength of 85,000 men, there would practically be only from 32,000 to 35,000 men for the protection of the continent.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What is the maximum number of men allowed under the law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. One hundred thousand; so it is still under the allowable strength of the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 8, line 14, before the word "pay," to strike out "For additional" and insert "Additional," so as to make the clause read:

Provided, That hereafter no officer or enlisted man in active service who shall be absent from duty on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquors or other misconduct shall receive pay for the period of such absence, the time so absent and the cause thereof to be ascertained under such procedure and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That hereafter an enlistment shall not be regarded as complete until the soldier shall have made good any time in excess of one day lost by unauthorized absences, or on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquors or other misconduct, or while in confinement awaiting trial or disposition of his case if the trial results in conviction, or while in confinement under sentence: Provided further, That the reviewing authority may suspend the execution of a sentence of dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement; but the order of suspension may be vacated at any time and the execution of the dishonorable discharge directed by the officer having general court-martial jurisdiction over the command in which the soldier is held, or by the Secretary of War: And provided further, That hereafter the authorized enlisted strength of the Army and of organizations thereof shall be exclusive of soldiers under sentences which include confinement and dishonorable discharge.

TRADING IN COTTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 110.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, resuming the remarks I was making yesterday, I wish to read extracts from an address delivered by Prof. Henry C. Emery at the annual banquet of the New York Cotton Exchange on February 2, 1912. It appears in the New York World and Chronicle of April 13, 1913, and shows the views of Prof. Emery on the subject of gambling, speculating, and insurance. He says:

"Now, what is the difference between insurance and speculation? Those really are the three classes of risks—gambling, insurance, and speculation. Insurance was looked upon as a gamble when it first started. Laws were passed and agitation was rife to stop insurance. Of course, anybody can see that insurance is gambling from the point of view of the man who has not analyzed it. I insure my house. That means that I bet $20 my house will burn down, and the insurance company bets $5,000 it will not burn down. From one point of view that's all there is to it. I insure my life. I bet so much I will die and the insurance company bets so much I will not die. That is why the Irishman refused to insure his life, because he said he would not go into a betting game where he had to die to win.

"Why is it, then, that we stand for insurance and believe in it? Simply for this reason, that these are inevitable risks. It is inevitable that people are going to die. It is inevitable that houses are going to burn down. These are the perfectly normal risks of life. It is so with the insurance of the normal risks in business. The man either takes the chances himself or shifts the chances. Somebody has got to take that risk, which exists. The question is, Can you shift it? If you don't want to carry it yourself, can you throw it off? In gambling you assume an artificial risk which does not exist and which you can avoid without the slightest trouble. Now, insurances proves to be of good social and economic value for this reason, that many men can not afford to take the risk and carry it themselves. A man who has a family and only an ordinary income can not take that chance of leaving them penniless. He will find an insurance company to take that chance for him. He will pay so much per year, and if he dies his family is taken care of. In the same way he can not afford to have his factory or his house burn down. Somebody else, not afraid to assume that risk, assumes it, for the simple reason that ninety-nine men out of one hundred will not die within the present year and ninety-nine houses out of one hundred will not burn down within the present year. In other words, all insurance is mutual insurance. Of course, some officers may draw out some big salaries, but ultimately it comes down to this fact. Therefore insurance has justified itself as an economic, moral, and social institution.

"The point about insurance is this: That insurance deals with the unusual proposition of a particular man dying or a particular house burning down. In other words, for every man who gets insurance for the burning of his home 99 men have paid in small premiums to insure their houses in the event of burning.

"Now, insurance can be made gambling, and I think the Lloyd's in England combine gambling with insurance. That is, I think, according to all economic standards, that some of Lloyd's insurance contracts are gambling contracts, and I think it for this reason: That they have gone beyond the proper function of insurance, and they have taken up something that is not a proper function of insurance at all. For instance, Lloyd's insured against an increase in the income tax. Now, if the income tax was increased it was increased for everybody. That is, they insured people for a certain sum each against an increase in the income tax, and if the income tax did go up they lost to all the people insured; there wasn't any money coming in; there wasn't anything to make good on excepting what they had accumulated."

Continuing, he says:

"And let me suggest here that the theory that speculation is purely artificial and that speculative markets are instituted arbitrarily like gambling houses is entirely disproved by the fact that it is only possible to have organized speculation of this kind in a few commodities. The commodity must be of such character that it can be classified into certain grades, in such a way that the quality in each grade will be uniform. It is for this reason that it has never proved possible to have future dealings in wool. Further, the commodity must be one of which neither the supply nor the demand is controlled by any single group of men. It must be a commodity like wheat or cotton, produced by many competing producers, with a world-wide market. Whenever a monopoly appears speculation disappears. There is active speculation in sugar on the Continent, but in this country there is no organized speculation in this commodity, since it is so largely controlled by a single concern."

Mr. President, I may interject right here that the people of Louisiana at this moment realize that sugar is controlled by a single concern—the Sugar Trust. They are not receiving anything like the price which that commodity should bring upon the market. There is no speculating in sugar as there is in cotton. It is all controlled by one powerful monopoly.

If my information is correct, the great farm products, such as corn, wheat, oats, and cotton, are all the subjects of future contracts in organized exchanges, and all these articles have for years been sold at prices fairly profitable to the farmers who produce them. Sugar, on the contrary, is not sold in any of the future contract markets in this country. There is no opportunity for legitimate speculating in sugar by the many merchants and others of large and small means. The entire sugar business is in the grip of the Sugar Trust, which regulates prices to suit itself, and which has for years ruthlessly crushed the industry in Louisiana, to the detriment of the farmer.

"The same is true of oil. Forty years ago there was active speculation in petroleum. It has entirely died out, owing to the control of the demand by the Standard Oil Co. In other words, it is impossible artificially to create a speculative market. It has been tried frequently and has always failed. Active speculative markets are found only as the result of natural conditions which necessitate speculation. And, sir, cotton is one of those which are in the natural condition that necessitates speculation."

Mr. President, much has been said about the report of Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, former Commissioner of the Bureau of Corporations, who prepared a very elaborate, comprehensive, and able report on cotton exchanges in 1908. I have heard the gentleman in charge of the bill, Senator SMITH of South Carolina, say that this report is a model and textbook on all subjects relating to cotton. I believe he is correct in his estimate of this work. It might well be called a cotton bible. Let me read a few brief extracts from it to show that, in the opinion of Mr. Smith, the basis contract, such as is used in the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, is necessary in order to carry on legitimate and proper transactions in cotton. On page 53, part 1, he says:

"It is apparent from even the brief illustrations given that a properly conducted future system, through this opportunity for hedging, affords a great protection to the most legitimate sort of business and one of almost incalculable value.

* * * * * * *

"The hedging process has been explained mainly to show that the future system is something more than a device for mere speculation, and that it presents benefits of great value to those conducting business in actual cotton. In fact, for these, as individuals, the future system, if properly used, may be said to largely eliminate speculation."

Mr. President, there is no doubt about it. There is a great deal less speculation when you use these future contracts properly than if you go into the market and buy and sell without the insurance furnished by the hedge feature of the future contract. It is a legitimate, safe, and conservative business compared with that conducted without the aid of the future contract. Continuing, Mr. Smith says:

"Obviously, for a merchant, without hedging, to buy 10,000, 20,000, or 50,000 bales of a valuable commodity like cotton, which is subject to great fluctuation in price, would be a highly speculative transaction, whereas, under a perfect working of the hedging system, the element of speculation can be largely avoided. This opportunity for hedging is, indeed, regarded by practically all cotton merchants as almost an absolute necessity under modern methods of conducting business.

"An idea of the value of the hedging function may be obtained when it is stated that in Great Britain banks very generally refuse to loan money on cotton which is not hedged."

I think I may add that in the United States that practice prevails to a very great extent, in some banks at least.

"Moreover, it is almost universally conceded that since the introduction of hedging failures in the cotton trade, which had previously been frequent, have been materially reduced as a direct result of the greater stability with which transactions in spot cotton can be conducted."

That is another statement which is absolutely true. There are very few failures now among cotton factors, whereas before the days of future contracts failures were very frequent.

In part 2, on page 15, I find in Mr. Smith's report the following:

"These suggestions may be commented on briefly.

"First. A 'specific' contract: It is wholly out of the question to make the contract an absolutely specific one; that is, to provide that only one particular grade shall be delivered. In view of the fact that future contracts are largely made before the quality of the crop is known, very few sellers of future contracts would dare to agree to deliver any particular grade of cotton on an exchange contract, owing to constant danger of intentional manipulation resulting in corners and squeezes. Such a restriction would practically destroy the future market by making it very narrow."

Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from South Carolina does not desire to destroy the future market. His intention is merely to correct the evils which have grown up in the system of future trading, and in that effort he certainly will have my hearty cooperation. If he is willing to amend the bill as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and myself, it will cure the evil without destroying the method, and that is what he seeks to do.

Continuing, Mr. SMITH says, at pages 22 and 23 of the summary:

"The first suggestion is for specific contracts; that is, that each contract shall name on its face either a single grade or certain specific grades. This would mean, of course, that there would be no single form of contract for future transactions, but an indefinite number. The buyer would know at the time he made his contract what grade or grades of cotton he would receive at its maturity. Such a contract, if it were practicable and could be secured, would go far toward eliminating some of the most serious evils which have accompanied future trading in cotton, and particularly, of course, those due to improper establishment of grade differences. As a matter of fact, although a specific contract is advocated by a few interests in the cotton trade, it is generally pronounced utterly impracticable for purposes of organized future trading, on the ground that few sellers would enter into such contracts."

That clearly indicates that if we are going to have only the specific contract provided in the bill presented by the Senator from South Carolina in its unamended form, it would destroy the business, for, as Mr. Herbert Knox Smith says, few sellers would enter into such contracts.

"The reason for this is that in the ordinary course of business contracts must be made months in advance of actual delivery, and oftentimes in advance of the gathering of the crop. Since the general character of a crop may be suddenly changed by abnormal weather conditions, this means that sellers of future contracts in the spring or summer can not possibly know what the relative supply of the various grades will be until the crop is finally harvested. Consequently sellers would be unwilling to commit themselves to future contracts for specific grades, since if there were a shortage of such grades this would undoubtedly be taken advantage of by manipulators of the future market to squeeze or corner such sellers. This danger is regarded, and with good reason, as a fatal objection to specific contracts for general trading purposes. Another objection to such contracts, already noted, is that the requirements of spinners are usually so specific, not only as to grade but as to length of staple and other characteristics, that even specific contracts would not enable them to take up cotton on the exchanges for direct shipment to their mills."

In other words, he says that the specific contract in the form advocated by the Senator from South Carolina would not even answer the purpose of the manufacturer.

Again, on page 175, Mr. Smith says: "A further serious objection to specific contracts for general trading purposes is that the requirements of most mills are so exacting that even specific contracts would not give satisfaction."

And on page 177 he says: "The objections to a specific contract for organized future trading purposes are convincing. From all the arguments for and against such a contract the fair conclusion seems to be that it would be entirely impracticable."

Mr. President, I think these quotations from Mr. Herbert Knox Smith show beyond any question that it is impracticable to have the specific contract provided in the bill of the Senator from South Carolina.

If the bill be amended so as to provide for the basis contract, with middling cotton as the base; for the delivery under that contract of any one of the nine Government standard grades; and for the payment of the difference between the value of the base and that of the grade actually delivered—not the arbitrary difference of the New York exchange, but the actual spot market difference—in a market where spot cotton is actually sold, as in the great cotton market of New Orleans, no injury will come to any man. It is a fair, honest, open, businesslike transaction when properly conducted, and there is no reason in the world why that kind of a contract should not be made. It will not interfere with any legitimate business. It will not promote undue speculation. It will to a great extent prevent speculation. It will help the cotton grower to get more money for his cotton than he gets now, because it will increase very largely the number of men engaged in buying cotton.

As I stated yesterday, if you do away with this contract you limit the men who buy cotton to the manufacturers, to the men in Europe and the United States who wish cotton to spin in their mills. You drive completely out of the market that very large class of merchants who buy the cotton and hold it until the mills desire it. The merchants frequently purchase it from their customers, the farmers who produce it, and store it in their warehouses, to hold there until they can make a good disposition of it to the mills which need it. They could not do this if there was no opportunity to hedge or insure by the future contract. You will drive out of the market entirely that large class of men who deal in cotton and who enhance the value of the cotton, because, sir, it is clearly understood by all that the greater the number of purchasers of any product the higher the price of that product.

Mr. President, I do not care to occupy longer the time of the Senate by reading extracts from letters and other documents which I have here, but I should like to annex to my remarks a letter received by me from Mr. John Phillips, of the firm of Goodlett & Co., in Memphis, together with a copy of the resolutions adopted by the Memphis Cotton Exchange on the 24th of last February.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Without objection, the matter will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

GOODLETT & CO.,
COTTON FACTORS,
Memphis, Tenn., March 20, 1914.

Hon. JOS. E. RANSDELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since the receipt of your letter of March 14, we have given considerable time and thought to the question of "Government control" of the cotton exchanges in this country, especially looking to the regulation of the New York Cotton Exchange; and, complying with your request, I am sending you herewith a copy of the resolutions adopted by the Memphis Cotton Exchange on February 24, 1914.

A very large part of the business done on the New York Cotton Exchange is what is known as "straddling," which is entirely outside of legitimate hedge business and is purely speculative. For example: They sell May cotton in New York and buy May-June cotton in Liverpool, and the present New York contract lends itself very easily to manipulation. The volume of this business is so enormous at times that they gave up keeping any record of this particular kind of trading, for fear of drawing the country's attention too much toward it.

To begin with, we would like to see some sort of Government supervision, because we are distrustful of the New York Exchange method of carrying out its contract. On paper or with a plausible talker it all seems very right and proper; but it all depends upon whether an outsider is tendering or receiving the actual cotton, as to the deal he gets. For instance, all cotton is supposed to be classed by two of the official classers of the New York Cotton Exchange. On an appeal from these two classers the cotton is classed by two other members of the same committee—there being four in all—and from their decision there is no appeal.

The classification committee consists of from four to seven men, according to how large a business is being done, and you can realize that if A and B are appealed to to-day to pass on C and D's work, knowing that tomorrow C and D may be called upon to criticize A and B's classing, there is not apt to be much disagreement. So we want some appeal from these classers' grades, as suggested in No. 4 of the Memphis Cotton Exchange resolutions referred to.

We note there has been some discussion in Congress of forcing the delivery of only one grade. This would not do, as a delivery of a single grade on any one contract would make the contract so narrow that it would absolutely kill the usefulness of it; restrict trading to a point where the producer would get no benefit in the premises.

You state in your letter that my letter indicates that we should have three grades for contracts, instead of nine. It matters not how many actual grades of cotton are dealt in, but the delivery of more than three whole or five half grades on any one contract would stop manipulation, and make it so that a buyer of a future contract could accept delivery of the actual cotton, if tendered, and handle it without trouble, as he would know that he would get practically even-running cotton that could be easily disposed of, when, under the present system, they can deliver him everything on the same contract, and give him such a conjumble of grades that it will be impracticable for him to accept delivery. This would apply especially to hedge purchases, both by the cotton buyer and the spinner.

If you will follow the suggestions made by the resolution adopted by the Memphis Cotton Exchange, which is the representative of a spot market, we feel that you can not make a mistake.

With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,

Yours, very truly,

JOHN PHILLIPS.

Resolutions adopted by the Memphis Cotton Exchange February 24, 1914:

"Whereas the present future contract of the New York Cotton Exchange is an impediment to business in that its fluctuations no longer bear any relation to the value of actual cotton, and as we feel that a future market with a contract fair and just to all is an absolute necessity in handling the cotton crop of the United States and maintaining prices when the movement is heaviest: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Memphis Cotton Exchange, That we urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to have the future contract departments of all cotton exchanges doing an interstate business put under the supervision of the United States Department of Agriculture and subject to such rules and regulations as the department shall judge right and proper.

"As cotton dealers, we would suggest that the following conditions be inserted in all contracts for 'futures':

"1. Have all contracts stipulate the United States Government standard classification.

"2. Make all exchanges adopt either commercial differences between grades or revise their differences every 30 days, basing these differences on the average differences then prevailing in the six largest American spot markets.

"3. Allow not more than three different grades or six different half grades, including the full grades, to be delivered on each contract of 100 bales.

"4. Require the class of each bale to be identified separately, and either have the classers deputized by the United States Government or allow an appeal from the classification committee to officials of the Department of Agriculture."

The intent of No. 3 was:

"Allow not more than three consecutive full grades, including the two intervening half grades," making five in all.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, also without reading, except the closing paragraphs, I wish to make a part of my remarks a letter addressed to me on the 18th of August last by Mr. W. B. Thompson, of New Orleans, La., who is a very large cotton planter and cotton commission merchant, one of the best-posted men in the South, one of our safest and ablest men, thoroughly reliable in every way, on this very important subject of dealing in cotton futures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

"W. B. THOMPSON & Co., COTTON FACTORS,
"New Orleans, August 18, 1913.

"Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SENATOR RANSDELL: Referring to the discussion of Senator SMITH'S antifuture bill (S. 110) recently held in the Senate Committee on Agriculture, I beg to submit the following comment:

"ORIGINAL BILL PROMISING.

"As originally framed and introduced this bill represented an effort in the right direction, and with a few changes in the text would have accomplished its stated purpose, to wit, the regulation of trading in cotton futures, which regulation, if properly applied, constitutes, in the present situation, a most beneficial and indeed a necessary exercise of legislative authority.

"The bill made obligatory the adoption of stable and authoritative standards of grades, namely, the United States Government standards. It recognized the necessity for a basis contract by giving the seller in a future contract the option of delivering cotton within the limits of one grade above or one grade below the grade contracted for, and it insured a proper adjustment of the relative values of said grades other than the contract grade delivered under said option by requiring that the said adjustment should be made on the basis of the 'commercial,' or actual, difference between the value of said grades delivered and that of the grade contracted for.

"Thus far the bill was constructed upon the proper principles, and but for certain errors made in the application of these principles would have been a good bill. Eliminating certain technical and not really material faults the said material errors in the bill are these: First, by extending its provisions to all interstate future contracts and to every person or party trading therein the bill not only undertakes to accomplish much more than is necessary or desirable, but it arbitrarily interferes with the private rights of individuals by restricting them to a particular form of future-delivery contract, regardless of the fact that the business of said individuals renders necessary the use of certain other forms which are in all respects proper and ethical. Second, by limiting the seller's option to only one grade above or only one grade below the contract grade the bill prescribes a future contract too narrow to accommodate the usual run of the crop and too restricted to permit its free use as a medium for hedge transactions.

"The first defect would, in my opinion, make the bill oppressive, and in consequence nonenforceable and abortive; the second defect would so restrict the offering of cotton for future delivery that the future markets would lose their usefulness, if they did not perish from sheer inanition.

"But, as I have stated, these defects may be remedied by simple amendment of the bill and the whole measure redeemed thereby. Obviously the necessary changes would be as follows:

"First. To amend the bill so that its provisions would apply to organized future trading; that is, to the contracts entered into by open bids and offers made in the future markets in and under the rules of the future contract exchanges.

"Second. To amend the bill so that the option of delivery would include all merchantable cotton within the limits of the grades standardized by the Government, to wit, from 'middling fair' to 'good ordinary,' according to said standards; or, to phrase the same option differently, to permit the delivery of merchantable cotton within the limit of two full grades above and two full grades below the middling grade on said Government standard.

"So much for the status of the bill in its original form.

"FATAL AMENDMENT.

"It has been reported that Senator SMITH now proposes to amend his bill, not in accordance with the foregoing suggestions, but by eliminating entirely the proviso granting the option in deliveries aforesaid. Hence, as he proposes to amend it, his bill would require that every person, copartnership, corporation, etc., who or which made contracts for the future delivery of cotton, must specify the grade or grades contracted for, and that such grade as is or grades as are contracted for must be according to the standards of the United States Government, under the penalty of the denial of the use of the mails and the instrumentalities of interstate commerce and a fine or imprisonment, or both, for the use of any other form of contract than that by the said act prescribed. The original bill was faulty, but curable; the bill as the Senator proposes to amend it would be impossible and hopeless.

"The objection to the effort to dictate the terms of all interstate contracts for the future delivery of cotton, regardless of the parties to such contracts or to the purposes and effect of the same, applies alike to the bill in its original and its proposed amended form. The objection to the terms of the contract prescribed applies to the bill in both forms, with this difference only, that these terms as prescribed in the original bill are faulty, but susceptible of remedy, whereas in the amended bill the terms of the contract prescribed are hopelessly repugnant to the functional utility of the future contract. In the discussion which follows, therefore, I will treat of these objections per se, without making specific application to the said two forms of the bill. The one defect I shall term the 'fault of scope,' the other I shall call the 'fault in terms.'

"THE FAULT OF SCOPE.

"Senator SMITH'S announced purpose is to regulate future-contract trading in the cotton exchanges, or to regulate what I have called organized trading. This is a perfectly proper subject for legislation, because the transactions consummated in these exchanges have an important effect upon the price of cotton and the state of the cotton trade. This effect is beneficial or injurious, according as the rules of operation governing such transactions are fair and square or partial and devious. The commodity exchanges are quasi-public institutions. It is therefore not only proper but it is necessary that the methods of trading in these institutions should be regulated by law. But in order to apply this regulation it is not necessary to cast a dragnet over the entire cotton trade. Assuming for the sake of argument that the Senator had devised a form of contract which, if enforced in organized future-trading marts, would remedy the certain specific defects which the said organized trading system has developed (which form of contract, be it observed, the Senator has not devised), it does not follow that such form of contract must be forced upon all sellers and buyers of cotton in all future transactions, in violation of the private rights of said parties, to the detriment of their private business, and without the shadow of reason or excuse for the imposition thereof. To illustrate: It is proper for the legislative authority to prescribe methods of regulation and rules of obligations and liability by which common carriers are governed in their relation to the public, but it is neither proper nor permissible for the legislative authority to devise laws for the regulation of common carriers and give the same universal and inappropriate application to every person who may undertake to carry a package for another.

"A DRAGNET.

"As presently constructed, this bill dictates certain technical terms of contractual obligations and makes such dictation apply not only to the speculator and trader in the future-contract markets, but to every individual farmer who from his plantation undertakes to make a sale of his crop for future delivery, and to every merchant and exporter who from his office or place of business undertakes to sell for future delivery his present or prospective holdings. As a matter of fact, nearly all of the sales by which the ownership of the cotton crop is transferred through its several steps of progress toward consumption are sales for future delivery. The time of delivery specified may be the next day, within seven days, at the expiration of the time required to transport the lot from one given point to another, upon arrival at a given destination, or at any specified time in the future. All of this great volume of transactions in actual cotton are sales for future delivery; hence all come within the purview of said bill. The bill requires that in all such contracts the grade or grades of the cotton covered thereby must be specified according to Government standardization or else the contractor shall be fined or sent to jail, or both. As an abstract proposition, any such attempted invasion of the private rights of the individual is indefensible. But let us go further and see what would be the practical effects of such a law.

"FARMERS' RIGHTS CURTAILED.

"A farmer, for instance, is satisfied with prevailing prices for future delivery and desires to avail himself of the advantage of contracting his growing crop at a fixed and satisfactory price. He does not wish to use the hedge contract procurable in the future contract markets of the exchanges. He probably does not know how to procure or use said hedge contract, but he knows a merchant or a buyer in a spot market located in a neighboring State with whom he has traded before and who knows the general character of the crop produced by said farmer. Although the farmer and the merchant could readily agree upon a round price at which the latter would take the crop when ready for delivery or could readily agree upon a price for middling with stated additions and deductions for the grades above and below the middling grade which might be delivered, still under Senator SMITH'S proposed law such contract would be prohibited, and if the farmer made the same he would be subject to a heavy fine and a term in jail. In such case the farmer would therefore be deprived of the privilege of making a forward sale of his crop. This conclusion is obviously true, because in order to make a legal contract therefor he must in said contract specify the grade or grades to be delivered, and this he can not do because he does not know and can not know in advance of the fact what grade or grades or what proportion of the several grades his crop will yield.

"INTERFERES WITH MERCHANTS AND SPINNERS—'TYPE' CONTRACTS PROHIBITED.

"Or take the case of the merchant who trades in actual cotton with other merchants and spinners in other States and abroad. Such merchant and his correspondents have found it advantageous in a large class of transactions to contract for future delivery on what they call 'types.' A type is not a sample of a specific grade, but is a conventional standard covering certain variations in grade together with certain other characteristics of staple, color, and general appearance. When a merchant offers to sell to his correspondent for future delivery a specified number of bales on a certain-named type, the said correspondent knows just what grade variations and characteristics the said type represents. These types are not specific grades on the United States Government standards, but represent variations in said specific grades and are inclusive rather than particular. Such contracts as between individual spot merchants and spinners, or as between merchant and merchant, constitute an important detail of the trade. There is nothing immoral, objectionable, or even questionable in such contracts between such parties, but, on the contrary, they are common trade conveniencies and indeed necessities, and yet this entire class of contracts would be, without reason or excuse, prohibited by Senator SMITH'S law, because, forsooth, they did not conform to his ironclad specifications.

"'AVERAGE' CONTRACTS AND OTHERS PROHIBITED.

"Again, as between individual cotton merchants and their customers, it is frequently the case that 'average' contracts are made for the purpose of accommodating some particular phase of the trade. The cotton spinner does not require one grade, and one grade only, or one or more particular grades of United States Government standardization, for the manufacture of his particular output. He may be satisfied with cotton of certain general grade and character within certain specified limits. If he secures a lot which averages a certain basis grade, with nothing below or above certain limits, his wants are supplied. He and the merchant are therefore willing to enter into such an average commitment, and, indeed, find it necessary to allow some latitude, because the wants of the spinner are not rigidly confined to any specific grade as standardized by the Government, and because it is practically impossible to accurately describe all the variations in grade and appearance which characterize each particular bale delivered. And yet all of these special contracts designed to meet the demands of the business of buying and selling and spinning cotton, and entirely free from any objection or criticism, are by Senator SMITH'S bill outlawed because they do not conform to his rigid specifications.

"RECKLESS APPLICATION.

"I have used the foregoing instances as merely illustrative of the purview of the bill. The examples mentioned by no means exhaust the catalogue of contracts affected. There are many other forms of conventional agreement between individual buyers and sellers of actual cotton which would be prohibited by the terms of the act in question. Indeed, every form and all forms of agreement for future delivery which did not conform to the rigid and inelastic formula prescribed in the bill would be, because of said fact, prohibited and barred. The fact that such outlawed contracts are sound both in morals and economy, and the fact that they are beneficial and, indeed, necessary mediums of agreement between the parties in trade, secures for them no immunity from the drastic pronouncement of the bill.

"I can not believe that Senator SMITH intends to restrict the entire cotton trade to the use of a narrow, inelastic, and unworkable contract formula, or to deny the individual trader the right to make contracts necessary to the advantageous conduct of his business, when such contracts, except only for the fiat of his bill, would be legal, and which, regardless of said fiat, are ethical and useful. He no doubt desires to remedy certain specific evils of a particular division of the cotton trade, but instead of directing his prohibition toward these specific evils, and instead of confining his attention to the particular division affected, he takes a pot shot at the contractual rights of all individuals who are unfortunate enough to be engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton. The particular complaint here urged is not that the Senator does not intend well, but that he has not exercised scientific discrimination either in the selection of his weapon or the direction of his attack. It is as if William Tell, instead of using a bow and arrow and aiming directly at the apple on his son's head, had discharged a load of bird shot from a wide-bore gun point-blank at the middle of the unhappy lad.

"REMEDY FOR FAULT OF SCOPE.

"This fault in the scope of the measure may be easily cured by the adding, at the end of line 5, after the word "cotton," the following words or words of similar effect: 'In the open future market of any cotton exchange or similar institution, or under the rules thereof governing the trading in such future markets.' By such amendment the application of the proposed remedy would be limited to the subject sought to be reformed.

"I have now endeavored to show how the proposed remedy should be applied. The next step is to determine whether the so-called remedy provided by Senator SMITH, namely, the 'specific grade contract' remedy, is a remedy in fact or a futile and destructive agency. This brings me to the discussion of the second fundamental objection to the bill, to wit.

"THE FAULT IN TERMS.

"The Senator proposes to rectify the defects and abuses of future contract trading by making it obligatory that all contracts for future delivery of cotton shall specify the grade or grades to be delivered thereon, which specification must be according to the grades established by the United States Government. In other words, he would deprive the seller in any such contract of any latitude in the premises and would limit the contractual right to the nine full and fractional grades established by Government standardization, and would require a rigid specification of which grade or which of said grades contractor would deliver. This prohibition of the elastic basis grade contract and this imposition of the rigid specific-grade contract upon the future contract markets would effectually deprive the cotton trade of its vitally important adjunct, namely, the hedging facility. The hedge contract is necessarily a basis grade contract, and its function is not to provide specific supplies or specific avenues of distribution, but to protect the holder from the risk of loss while he is engaged in assembling his specific supplies and discovering the specific avenues of distribution. The two forms of contracts have distinct and different functions. The specific-grade contract supplies the spinner with the particular grades and character of cotton necessary for his purpose; the basis-grade contract supplies the merchant with a protection which enables him to contract without undue risk with the spinner for the specific grades by the latter required. The basis-grade contract provides the hedge or insurance, which makes feasible a contract for the future delivery of specific grades.

"FUNCTIONAL DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SPECIFIC AND BASIS-GRADE CONTRACTS.

"The point which I wish to make clear is illustrated by the following example:

"Suppose I have in warehouse a stock of 5,000 bales of cotton running in grade from good ordinary to middling fair. Some of this cotton is what we call "good color" and free from any traces of sand or dust. There is, however, a certain proportion which has been more or less stained or tinged by reason of exposure in the fields, and some of it having been grown in the dry sections or the hills, contains some sand or grit or dust, or traces of the same. There are also variations in the fiber or staple of the cotton. Some is short-staple cotton grown in the uplands; some has heavier body and longer fiber, such as the "benders," as we call cotton grown in certain sections of the valley of the Mississippi River; and some are extra staples, running in length of fiber from an inch and one eighth to an inch and one-half. Each bale of this stock has its specific market value, running from, say, 11 cents to 25 cents, or 30 cents per pound, as determined by the characteristics aforesaid.

"But I realize that I am taking a considerable risk in carrying said stock of cotton, unless I can insure the same against loss or damage by fire. Therefore pending such time as I can sell and deliver said stock I take out a policy of fire insurance on the said 5,000 bales. I do not and can not take out a separate policy on each particular bale or on each specific grade or class, or upon the 'tinges' and 'stains,' or upon the 'benders' or 'extra staples.' Neither do I, nor can I, take out a policy on the entire lot and specify in said policy the number of bales of each specific grade or class and the several characteristics of the same as hereinbefore enumerated. I take out a policy on the 5,000 bales for a sum which will cover the value of the entire lot. I arrive at this figure by averaging the value of my cotton on the basis of so much for this grade and description, so much for that, and so much for the other. In the event of a fire which causes a total loss, I prove up my claim on the above basis. If the loss is only partial, I prove it up on the basis of the bale or bales destroyed, which will be less or more than the average value per bale according as the poorer or better cotton is lost. This, then, is my insurance contract, which you will observe is not a specific-grade contract, but a basis or blanket contract.

"Having thus protected myself from the risk of carrying said stock of cotton, I set about disposing of the same. I offer to my several correspondents in the South or the East or in Europe the kind and character of cotton which my experience tells me is adapted to their several needs. As the result of these negotiations I sell to one spinner 100 bales of strict middling, inch and one-eighth staple. To another I sell a lot of good middling, to another a lot of low middling stained, and so on, until I have contracted my entire stock. These contracts between the said several spinners and myself are, as you will observe, specific-grade contracts. You will also note the difference between the purposes accomplished by the specific-grade contracts with the spinners and the basis-grade contract with the insurer. By reason of the protection offered by the latter, I am given an opportunity to negotiate my stock by specific commitments, and to carry the same until such time as my correspondent desires shipment and delivery. As I make these several specific shipments and deliveries I cancel my insurance contract pro tanto, until at last, when my stock has been distributed to perhaps a score of mills in different parts of the world, my insurance contract expires by final cancellation.

"SPECIFIC-GRADE CONTRACT UNSUITED TO HEDGING TRANSACTIONS.

"Having emphasized the distinction between a specific-grade contract for delivery and a basis or blanket contract for protection, I will revert to my original proposition, to wit, that the hedge contract is naturally and of necessity a basis or blanket contract, and that the effort to make it a specific-grade contract will destroy its utility.

"The insurance policy in the foregoing illustration constitutes a protection against loss by fire; the hedge contract of the cotton trade is a protection against loss by reason of future fluctuations in the market price of the cotton covered thereby.

"Reverting to the foregoing illustration of the 5,000-bale stock, having protected myself against loss by fire by said basis contract of insurance, I am at liberty to take my time to make specific contracts against my holdings. But I have not all the protection that I desire, nor all the protection that will enable me to minimize the element of speculation in my business. Pending such time as I may make specific disposition of my stock, there may be a decline in the market value of cotton which will entail a considerable loss to me. I therefore desire to protect myself against such decline. I find that I can do this by selling in the future-contract market at a basis price 5,000 bales of cotton. I execute this hedge. I am therefore at liberty to take my time in negotiating specific commitments. It is just as impracticable for me to specify in my hedge contract the grade or varieties of grades, with qualifications as to character, staple, color, sand, etc., as it was in the case of my insurance contract against fire, as heretofore shown. What I do, and the only thing that I can do in the premises, is to sell contracts for 5,000 bales, in which I agree to deliver cotton within the range of grades from good ordinary to middling fair at a stated price for middling, with deductions and additions for the other grades and descriptions to be delivered, the amount of said additions and reductions to be ascertained by the quotations of actual sales in the market of delivery. Having thus hedged myself, I proceed to negotiate specific transactions, whereby I dispose of my stock directly to my trade correspondents, and as I make such specific sales I cancel out my hedge pro tanto, until finally, when my stock has been shipped to specific destination, my hedge is finally liquidated.

"LATITUDE NECESSARY.

"I hope that these examples will illustrate the generic difference between the specific obligation of the merchant and the protective utility of the hedge contract. It would be just as reasonable in the first case illustrated to ordain by law that the merchant should make the same character of contract with the fire insurer that he makes with the spinner consumer as it would be in the second case to compel the merchant to make the same contract with the hedge underwriter that he makes with his spinner customer. In both of these cases the merchant requires a blanket protection for his stock and for his specific commitments in relation thereto, and in neither can he secure this protection through a rigid contract of insurance which depends for its validity upon the correctness of the technical descriptions of the multitude of items insured, and which must be changed, amended, or rewritten upon the daily, and perhaps hourly, variations in the proportions of the several technical units which in the total make up the stock covered thereby. The specific grade contract is therefore an unworkable medium for the transaction of the hedging business, and if forced by law upon the future-contract markets would inevitably deprive the cotton trade of this most essential protection, upon which the great economic system of carrying, financing, and marketing the crop is based.

"Having endeavored to show, by explanation of the nature and functions of the specific-grade contract and the basis-grade contract, that the former can not be employed as the medium of hedge transactions, I shall proceed to assign the reasons why such specific-grade contract is incompatible with any comprehensive system of future trading and will, if made obligatory, put an end to the future market itself.

"SOURCE OF SUPPLY OF SELLING CONTRACTS.

"Cotton must be sold for future delivery or else it can not be bought. The initiative is with the seller, hence if there were no sellers there could be no future trading.

"The selling contracts in the future market are derived from three sources: First, from the farmer who desires to hedge his crop against a decline occurring before he can market it; second, from the merchant who buys from the farmer and desires to hedge his holdings against a decline pending such time as he may dispose of the same to a spinner or to another merchant; third, by the speculator who believes that cotton will decline in value before his contract matures, thereby yielding him a profit on the transaction.

"FARMER SELLER ELIMINATED.

"The primary seller in the future market is the producer, or, as we shall call him here, the farmer. When the farmer makes a forward sale of the crop which he expects to produce, whether said sale be a direct sale to a merchant or a hedge sale in the future market, the contract covering the same must of necessity be a basis contract and not a specific-grade contract. This is true because of the fact that the farmer does not produce a crop of one grade only but of a number of grades. Just what the grade outturn of the crop will be the farmer does not know and can not know until it is picked, ginned, and sampled. If, during the season when the cotton is open in the fields, the weather conditions are propitious, then the character of the yield will be relatively high. If, on the contrary, excessive rains or other unfavorable developments occur during said season, staining the lint or beating it out upon the ground, then the character of the yield will be relatively low. But whether there will be a preponderance of high or low grades, or what will be the proportion of each grade in the total yield, the farmer does not know and has no means of determining until the crop is actually in the bale.

"If, therefore, while the crop is growing the farmer, satisfied with the price he may obtain for fall deliveries, desires to sell his crop and thereby insure himself against a possible decline in price he must of necessity make a basis contract; that is, a contract whereby he obligates himself to deliver his crop, or such part thereof as he may desire to sell, at a stated price for a certain basis grade with so much more or less for such grades as he shall deliver other than said basis grade. Under Senator SMITH's proposed law providing that all interstate contracts for future delivery must specify the grade or grades contracted for the said farmer would be prohibited from making any forward sale of his crop outside of his limited locality; or if he attempted to make such sale, either by complying with said provision or ignoring it, he would find himself in the following predicament:

"If he was not advised as to the law, or if in violation of the law he undertook to sell his crop on the only feasible terms, to wit, on the basis terms, he would lay himself liable to be sentenced to a three-year term of imprisonment or to pay a fine of $5,000, or to both penalties. It is hardly possible, therefore, that he would make or attempt to make the sale. But suppose that he was exceedingly anxious to secure the prices then available. Let us for the sake of the argument indulge the absurd assumption that the farmer in such case would attempt to contract his crop in accordance with the provisions of said act. We will suppose that by referring to past records he found that in previous years his crop of, say, 100 bales had turned out about as follows: Fifteen bales middling fair, 40 bales good middling, 20 bales middling, 20 bales low middling, and 5 bales good ordinary. Suppose he entered into a future contract committing himself to the delivery of said grades in said proportion, or suppose he might be excused from specifying the number of bales of each particular grade and merely obligated himself to deliver cotton of the said several grades specified. Subsequent to the time he entered into said contract and during the season when his cotton was open in the fields let us suppose that a period of excessive rains prevailed or that a storm occurred. As a result he might find that he could deliver no middling fair, no good middling, only a few bales of middling, the great bulk of his crop being lower than the last-named grade. In such case the buyer could and would most probably demand the specific delivery of the particular grades contracted for and at the price stipulated for each. The farmer, therefore, in order to avoid breaching his contract would have to go into the market and purchase at a premium the grades of which he was short. But it is reasonable to assume that the conditions which had affected the said particular crop had likewise deteriorated the crops throughout the entire section, hence the farmer in question might be unable to purchase said grades at any price, or if he might find a few such bales he would be obliged to pay a ruinous premium therefor. In such case the said seller in the contract would be at the mercy of the buyer to be "squeezed" by the latter to the extent of his bent; and the farmer, instead of having avoided the risk of fluctuations, as he had intended when he made the contract, would find that he had, in fact, by reason of the rigid terms of said contract, committed himself to a wild and ruinous speculative venture.

"Of course it is absurd to suppose that any farmer in his right mind would enter into such contract or enter into the same more than once. Hence we can conclude that Senator SMITH's specific grade contract law would not only deprive the farmer of the privilege of selling his crop for future delivery outside of his restricted locality and of the privilege of hedging the same in the future-contract markets, but would also eliminate from said markets the supply of selling contracts contributed by the primary seller of cotton, namely, the producer.

"But it may be claimed that the farmer does not make these forward sales; hence neither he nor the future markets are affected by the prohibition thereof. I reply that a number of farmers do make such sales and do hedge their growing crop in the future markets directly; but the point is this: That even if the farmer did not himself sell for future delivery or hedge his crop, still some one else does sell for such delivery, thereby giving the farmer the benefit of such sale or hedge by creating a market for his crop when it is ready for sale.

"HEDGE SELLER ELIMINATED.

"I have stated that the second source of the supply of selling contracts in the future markets lies in the commitments of merchants who buy the farmers' crops when they are brought to market and who sell hedges against the same, pending such time as they may be able to make disposition thereof. Inasmuch as the said crop contains a number of grades, the purchaser thereof, in order to protect himself, must sell a basis contract covering said grades until he can parcel them out among his customers requiring particular grades and characters of cotton. If he should be compelled to hedge his holdings by rigid specific grade obligations, he would find that his hedge would be subject to the vicissitudes of fluctuation as in the preceding case of the farmer; and, furthermore, he would find that a grade or some of the grades he wished to hedge, being plentiful, were not in demand by buyers, and hence he could not sell his hedge at all, or else at a discount, which would necessarily reduce the price he could pay the farmer. On the other hand, those grades which, because of scarcity, were in demand he could hedge, but these he would not care to hedge. Hence the specific-grade contract being contrary to the very principle of protection, which is the essential function of the hedge contract, would prevent the hedge-selling merchant from issuing such contracts, and thus deprive the future market of this important source of contract supply.

"THE SPECULATOR BARRED.

"Having eliminated the farmer who desired to sell his crop for future delivery, and the merchant who desired to hedge his holdings, the only source of selling contracts remaining to the future markets would be in the speculative seller.

"The specific-grade contract would make short work of the speculative short in the future markets. Indeed, the professed purpose of the bill is to eliminate speculation. No surer way of accomplishing this result could be found. I will not here discuss the economic function of speculative short selling, nor the importance of speculative contracts in supplying the nucleus from which is developed the broad future market which makes freely available the nonspeculative hedge contracts of the trade. The point is that the specific-grade contract will restrict to the point of extermination the issuance of speculative contracts of sale. The reason is obvious. The short speculative contracts are issued by the trader who believes that future prices will be lower. His viewpoint and situation is similar to that of the farmer who desires to make a forward sale of his crop. Both believe that prices will decline—the farmer has his crop yet to make and the short seller has his deliveries yet to buy—and neither knows what the grade outturn of the crop will be. Such seller believes that there will be no difficulty in securing enough merchantable cotton to fulfill his contracts in case he is called upon to so liquidate the same, but he does not know that he will be able to buy any named specific grade or grades of cotton. He therefore requires a basis grade contract as the medium of his commitments. He is willing to take the chance of contracting to deliver cotton which he must subsequently purchase in order to liquidate his obligation, but he is not willing to commit himself to an obligation which, under certain contingencies or by reason of certain artificial local conditions he could not fulfill at all, or not without serious loss, not in contemplation when he issued his contract. Under the specific-grade contract proposed by Senator SMITH, this is just what he would be required to do. Suppose, for instance, that such trader should make a specific-grade contract whereby he obligated himself to make future delivery of so many bales of strict middling cotton; and suppose it should happen, as I have seen it happen, that a storm late in September should damage the entire open crop of the section tributary to the market in which his contract was specifically performable. His contract grade being scarce or not purchasable, or not purchasable except at an exorbitant premium, the buyer in the contract would be sure to demand specific performance of the grade contract, and the seller would therefore be "squeezed." These specific-grade contracts are therefore adapted not at all to the demands of the speculative division of the trade. A cautious trader would not enter into a contract which held such peril lurking therein, or, if he did offer to make such contract, he would necessarily demand a price high enough to cover the added risk, and too high for any cautious buyer to entertain.

"Thus, I think it may be demonstrated that Senator SMITH'S specific-grade contract would put an end to the utility of the future-trading markets by drying up the sources from which the necessary volume of short contracts are supplied. The farmer could not sell, the merchant could not afford to sell, and the speculator would not sell such contracts. If any scurces of supply other than these exist outside of legislative imagination, I am not aware of the same. We may, therefore, conclude that Senator SMITH'S bill would not regulate future contract trading, as proposed, but would, in fact, destroy the future-contract markets. Such a consummation we earnestly hope to escape. It is a serious and, indeed, a tragic consummation this of summarily wrecking a great economic organization, demoralizing a complex system of trade, and bringing distress upon a multitude of people, of whom the most conspicuous sufferer will be the man working in the cotton field, who knows little or naught of the legislative experiments threatened in his alleged behalf.

"LOGICAL RESULTS.

"But I expect that some who have not followed the somewhat technical lines of this argument will answer with the summary assertion that my conclusions are all wrong and that the specific-grade contract provision of the said act will not drive the traders from the future market. I submit that there is no gainsaying the logic of my contention. Still, for the sake of demonstrating at all points the futility of the specific-grade contract as a medium of general future trading, I shall assume that my reason and conclusions are incorrect. I shall admit, for the sake of the argument, that Senator SMITH'S bill will repeal the law of cause and effect; that the specific-grade contract will not deprive the farmer of the privilege of selling his crop for future delivery; that it will not deter the merchant from selling against his holdings; that it will not banish the speculative short seller from the market; and, finally, that it will not decrease the number of buying and selling offers in the future-contract market, but will, on the contrary, increase the same. For the sake of the argument, I shall assume the correctness of the foregoing conclusions, and then I shall show that, nevertheless, the restriction of future trading to the specific-grade contract will destroy both the hedging and speculative function of the future contract and will bring about a sure paralysis of the future-contract markets themselves.

"BEDLAM.

"There are 5 full grades and 4 half grades, or a total of 9, standardized by the Government. Under Senator SMITH'S bill the Secretary of Agriculture is required to standardize 'upland' and 'gulf' cotton separately. This will bring the grade standards up to the total of 18. Senator SMITH'S bill further requires the Secretary of Agriculture to standardize according to grades, the stains and tinges. This will bring the total standards up to 36 at the least. Furthermore, the said bill requires that in case long-staple cotton is bought and sold for future delivery the length of the staple shall be designated in the contract. Staples are commonly measured by the sixteenth part of an inch. The general run of staples is from an inch to an inch and a half, making eight different length units to be designated. Apply this staple variation to the 36 grade standards already provided for, and we will have a total of 288 grade variations, which, under Senator SMITH'S bill, are the subjects of contract, and all or any of which must be specified in the contract by which it is undertaken to sell the same.

"Let us imagine that the bill in question had become a statute and that in defiance of the law of cause and effect, logical sequence and human probability, a great number of men had gathered around the ring of a future trading market for the purpose of demonstrating the trade utility of Senator SMITH'S specific grade contract. One broker would perhaps be offering in succession the 288 varieties of contracts, while at his elbow another broker would be offering one contract containing 288 grade specifications at a different price for each. Or perhaps one would be shouting an offer to sell a low middling-tinged contract, while his neighbor was crying aloud that he would buy good middling inch and five-sixteenths. Another would want a contract providing for good, ordinary, and middling fair in equal proportions, while still another might pierce the din with a hungry supplication for 25 bales middling to strict, 15 bales strict good ordinary spotted, 18 bales middling tinged, 20 bales strict middling inch and three-sixteenths, 15 bales good middling inch and one-half, and 7 bales of middling fair, a total of 100 bales, one-half of which must be on the 'upland' standard and one-half on the 'gulf.' It is quite impossible for the mind to follow the infinite number of contracts and combinations of contracts through which the manifold specific requirements of the cotton trade would clamor for satisfaction, and the most vigorous imagination is staggered by the effort to conceive the future quotation board whereon were recorded the price vagaries of this economic nightmare.

"Furthermore, passing these fantastic developments, let us consider another result that would proceed from the attempt to use the specific-grade contract in the future market. Let us suppose that a number of traders recognizing the futility of trying to trade in the variety of contracts aforesaid, should agree to establish a submarket in which the only contracts bought and sold would be those covering one or more of the nine full and half grades established by presently existing Government standards. The fact that under such an arrangement all the cotton representing the intermediate grades or variations from the straight fair-color standards—which would, in fact, constitute a large part of the crop—would be barred from future contract sale and delivery would be of itself enough to condemn and destroy the proposed system. Still, we will suppose, for the sake of the argument, that such traders had established such system and were buying and selling contracts in accordance therewith. Suppose that during the summer months a number of contracts had been put out covering each of the said standard grades—good ordinary, low middling, middling, and so forth. In each of these contracts the grade contracted for would be specified, the value of each of these several contracts would fluctuate according to the vicissitudes affecting the specific grades in the market of delivery, and it would be found that certain grade contracts would at times show a fictitious premium or discount entirely out of line with the value of other grade contracts and out of line with the trade value of the cotton itself. Suppose, for example, that a number of good-ordinary contracts and low-middling contracts for October delivery were outstanding. Suppose that the available stock in the market and vicinity contained very little good ordinary and low middling cotton. When October came the seller being confined to the delivery of these specific grades would be "squeezed"; or, in other words, the price of good ordinary and low middling contracts would for the time and until the buyer permitted the seller to settle said contracts be forced entirely out of line with the contracts for the other grades, and it might easily be the case that during the time of such distress on the part of the seller the said good ordinary and low middling contracts would sell at a premium over middling and good-middling contracts and for a higher price than cotton of middling and good-middling grades was bringing in the spot market. Or, suppose that there was a preponderance of low-middling contracts and good-middling contracts outstanding and few of good ordinary and middling fair. If at the time of maturity of said contracts it should happen—which is not at all unlikely—that the lower grades were plentiful in said market and the higher grades scarce, the abnormal condition would be presented wherein low-middling contracts would sell under good-ordinary cotton and good-middling contracts above middling fair.

"When we multiply these possibilities by the number of grades that may or must under said specific grade contract provision be the subjects of future trading, and consider the additional complications which may be brought about by the variety of general and local conditions affecting the supply of the particular grades under contract and the demand therefor, we can appreciate the extreme confusion and instability with which the future market would be afflicted under such a law of operation. Under such conditions such future contract quotations as might be obtained would show erratic fluctuations and flagrant misbehavior sufficient not only to destroy the usefulness of the future contract as a trade or hedging medium but to render the future market a public nuisance calling for abatement by summary process of law. But we need not bother our minds with these grotesque speculations. Under the application of Senator SMITH'S specific the future markets of America would promptly pass into death through the peaceful issue of inanition and not through the harrowing convulsions depicted.

"I apologize for the length of this communication. I ground my excuse upon the importance of the issue and the earnestness of my desire that, through a proper understanding of the subject, a great calamity may be averted. To those acquainted with the machinery of the cotton trade the conclusions herein set out are accepted as matters of common knowledge, but to those who are not familiar with said machinery some special attention to technical explanation is necessary. We are dealing with a complex economic system which renders an indispensable service in the vital details of carrying, marketing, and distributing the cotton crop. Unfamiliarity with the machinery of said system may easily lead the best-disposed reformer into interferences which will disorganize and wreck the whole."

Mr. RANSDELL read as follows:

"SUMMARY.

"In conclusion, permit me to hold your attention for a moment longer while I summarize my conclusions and apply the same to the issue at hand.

"The specific-grade contract, although a medium of everyday use and necessity to buyers and sellers of cotton in their personal contractual relation, is not adapted to the needs of the future-contract market wherein said buyers and sellers may hedge and protect their said specific obligations, but is, in fact, wholly incompatible therewith. In order to procure in sufficient volume the issuance of contracts to make future delivery of supplies not yet in hand it is necessary to allow the seller some reasonable latitude in the grades to be delivered. This necessary latitude is afforded in what is called a basis-grade contract, which is a contract to deliver so many pounds or bales of cotton at a certain price for a stated basis grade, with deductions and additions for such grades other than the basis grade which may be delivered. The basis-grade contract is the only form of contract adapted to the operation of the future-contract market. It is perfectly fair to all parties and wholly unobjectionable, provided that the terms thereof are proper and the administration thereof honest. These safeguards can be and should be guaranteed by a law regulating the operations of those institutions wherein the future markets are created. The first essential of a proper basis-grade contract is that the grades deliverable thereon should be standardized by fair and authoritative public types."

Just, for instance, as our Department of Agriculture has done. It standardizes cotton, it furnishes us the authoritative types, and if we confine ourselves to those authoritative types there is no trouble with the basis contract.

Continuing he says:

"The second prerequisite is that the cotton deliverable on said contract shall be confined to those grades and characters which are currently saleable in the usual course of the spot trade, being cotton whose value is constantly, readily, and with reasonable accuracy ascertainable, and not very low or undesirable cotton or specialties which have no regular sale and hence no constantly, readily, and accurately ascertainable value. The third essential of a fair basis-grade contract is that the settlement of the difference between the basis grade and the other grades delivered shall be made upon the quotations for such grades established in markets of actual purchase, sale, and delivery, and not upon any arbitrary, artificial, or fictitious valuation."

Mr. President, there is where the principal trouble has arisen. In the New Orleans market for years these differences have been settled upon the actual "spot" differences in the value of the actual "spot" cotton in actual trades between buyer and seller; but that is not true in the New York Cotton Exchange; it is not now true, and it has not been true for a long time. There the differences in the value of the cotton tendered and the value of the cotton stated as the basis in the contract have been fixed arbitrarily by a committee, without any regard to the actual "spot" value in an actual cotton market. As a result of this arbitrary difference very great unfairness has arisen; men have been swindled; and there is a great deal of prejudice, and just prejudice, against that form of dealing. It is an outrageous form of proceeding; it should be corrected beyond any question, and I glory in the attempt of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to correct it. I think he is entitled to the greatest credit for his efforts to correct this evil. This letter continues:

"With the foregoing three essentials enforced by the strong arm of the law, the basis grade contract will be amply safeguarded and any misuse thereof prevented. Senator SMITH'S original bill will accomplish these much desired results, provided, first, that it be amended so as to limit the purview thereof to the future contract markets in the several exchanges, and provided, secondly, that it be amended so as to permit delivery on the basis contract of all merchantable cotton within the high and low grade limits established by the Government standards, to wit, from middling fair to good ordinary, inclusive, on said standards"—

Just, Mr. President, as is provided by the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]—

"or, to express the same option in different words, to permit delivery of cotton within two full grades above and two full grades below the middling grade on said Government standards.

"The recognition of these cardinal principles is essential to the wise treatment of the subject of future contract trading. Based upon these fundamentals, Senator SMITH'S bill or any measure of similar purport will serve a remedial and constructive purpose; formulated in disregard of these principles or in antagonism thereto, such legislation will be not only futile but fatal.

"Respectfully,

"W. B. THOMPSON."

Mr. President, in conclusion permit me to say that the views expressed by Mr. Thompson are the views of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. If this bill be amended as suggested in this letter—which suggestions are carried out in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and also in my amendment—the bill will be entirely satisfactory to the cotton exchange in New Orleans and to the cotton growers in Louisiana and elsewhere.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to amend the substitute now before the Senate, on page 1, line 6, to strike out the words "or receive."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 1, line 6, of the reported substitute for the bill, it is proposed to strike out the words "or receive" after the word "send."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not the bill before me, but I assume the amendments relate to the subject to which I called the Senator's attention yesterday, to receiving letters?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This other amendment does go to the point.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope that that will be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the substitute proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I propose another amendment to the substitute, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 1, line 7 of the proposed substitute, after the word "matter," it is proposed to insert:

In the promotion or furtherance of the making or enforcing of such contract or contracts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is agreed to, without objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not understand that, and I will ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish first to offer another amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask a question. Is the Senator from South Carolina now moving to amend the substitute which he has offered?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. And not the original bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I am proposing to amend the substitute.

In section 3, page 2, line 14, after the word "send," I move to strike out the words "or receive," so as to conform to the other amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish now to present, perfected, the amendment which was printed several days ago, and which I then suggested for the consideration of the Senate. I have eliminated certain features in the amendment to which some Senators objected. The amendment as now proposed meets with the approval of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and those of us who have been working on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia proposed as an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is proposed as an amendment to the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 1, line 9, of the reprint of the substitute, after the word "cotton," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph, and in lieu thereof to insert:

To comply with the following conditions:

That such contract shall specify the number of bales of cotton involved in the contract, the price per pound of middling cotton, hereinafter called the basis grade, at which the cotton is contracted to be bought or sold, the date of the purchase or sale, and the month in which the contract is to be fulfilled or settled, and provide that the cotton therein mentioned or dealt with shall be within the grade limits fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, to wit, within the limits of middling fair and good ordinary, inclusive, of Government standards, and no other grade or grades, and provide that in the settlement of such contract by the actual delivery of the cotton other than the basis grade, the difference above or below the contract price which shall be paid for such grades shall be determined as hereinafter provided.

That for the purposes of this paragraph the differences above or below the contract price which shall be paid for grades above or below the basis grade, in the settlement of a contract for the future delivery of cotton, by the actual delivery of the cotton involved therein, shall be determined by the actual commercial differences in value thereof, established by bona fide sales of spot cotton of the same grades, respectively, made in the course of actual trade, upon the sixth business day prior to the settlement of the contract, in the market where the future transaction involved takes place and is consummated; and in the event that there be no bona fide spot market in which spot sales are made from day to day, at or in the place in which such future transaction takes place, then, and in that case, the said average differences in value in the spot markets at five places designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, as the said average differences were established by the sales of spot cotton of the same grade, respectively, in such five markets upon the sixth business day prior to the settlement of the contract: Provided, That for the purposes of this paragraph such values in the said spot markets be based upon the standards for grades of cotton fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture. That for the purposes of this paragraph the only markets which shall be considered bona fide spot markets shall be such as are designated by the Secretary of Agriculture. That in determining, pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph, what markets are bona fide spot markets, the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to consider only markets in which spot cotton is sold in such volume and under such conditions as customarily to reflect accurately the price of middling cotton and the differences between the prices or values of middling cotton and other grades of cotton for which standards shall have been established by the Secretary of Agriculture.

That such contract shall further provide that each bale of cotton tendered for delivery shall be separately marked and tagged before date of delivery and the date of its arrival and classification indicated thereon, and that no cotton which has been certified for a longer period than one year can be tendered or delivered.

Such contract must further provide that no pro forma tender can be made, but actual delivery of classified cotton shall be made on the day named for delivery in the contract.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the end of one portion of my amendment. It might be well first to act on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to the substitute reported by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now state the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. After section 1 of the substitute, it is proposed to insert a new section, to be known as section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to standardize the grades of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately; and such grades as are established for both "upland" and "gulf" cottons shall not include cotton below good ordinary or above middling fair. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture also to standardize according to grades, stains, and tinges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to designate the present section 2 as section 3.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the committee, after section 3, it is proposed to insert a new section, to be known as section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That no person or corporation shall send through the mails or over the telegraph wires any price lists of sales of cotton in any cotton exchange engaged in selling futures which does not use a contract for future delivery of cotton in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding a new section, to be known as section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That no person whose evidence is deemed material by the officer prosecuting on behalf of the United States shall withhold his testimony because of complicity by him in any violation of this statute, but any such person so required to give evidence as a witness shall be exempt from prosecution in any court of the United States for the particular offense in connection with the prosecution whereof such testimony was given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting after section 5 a new section to be known as section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. It is hereby declared to be legal for any number of men or corporations to agree to purchase lint cotton and to further stipulate that the same is not to be sold by or through a cotton exchange which is engaged in selling futures.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the words "from an exchange engaged in trading in futures" have been omitted from the draft sent to the Secretary's desk. I ask that those words be inserted after the word "cotton."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia modifies his amendment to the amendment. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment, after section 5, by inserting a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. It is hereby declared to be legal for any number of men or corporations to agree to purchase lint cotton from an exchange engaged in trading in futures and to further stipulate that the same is not to be sold by or through a cotton exchange which is engaged in selling futures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary again state the amendment to the amendment as it now reads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Is that the way the Senator from Georgia desires the amendment to read?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask for information, whether it is the purpose to expressly authorize by a statute of Congress gambling in futures in cotton?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I want to say that I had in my mind the same inquiry. It seems to me that the last amendment read simply stipulates that men may gamble in cotton futures, and I will not vote for any measure that contains such a provision as that. I think it ought to be forbidden insead of authorized.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator refers to section 6?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; to the amendment which was just read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the Senators have placed upon the section exactly the wrong meaning. What it means is that a contract providing that certain cotton shall not be used on an exchange dealing in futures shall not be illegal.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know whether or not I understand that. Will the Senator explain just what he means by it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It means that if two or more men agree to purchase a lot of lint cotton and agree further that they will distribute that lint cotton to manufacturers for actual manufacturing purposes and not sell it on a cotton exchange which is engaged in selling futures, such a contract shall be legal. It is just the reverse of what the Senator has in mind; it is to make legal a contract that they will distribute the cotton among manufacturers and not put it on a futures exchange to be speculatively used.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand the wording of the section, it will allow any number of men or corporations to agree to purchase lint cotton from an exchange engaged in selling futures. That is what the section plainly says. Does the Senator claim that the meaning of that language is different from the interpretation which I place upon it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will leave out the words "from an exchange engaged in selling futures."

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly why I called the Senator's attention to those words and asked that they be read again from the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will omit the language "from an exchange engaged in selling futures."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator restate the amendment so that the Secretary may get it?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if it would not be better to strike out from line 7 the words "from an exchange engaged in selling futures and to" and to insert the word "and," so that the section then would read:

It is hereby declared to be legal for any number of men or corporations to agree to purchase lint cotton and to further stipulate that the same is not to be sold by or through a cotton exchange.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is entirely satisfactory, and I accept the suggestion. I will ask to modify my amendment in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 8, of the proposed amendment to the amendment it is proposed to strike out the words "from an exchange engaged in selling futures and to" and to insert the word "and," so as to read:

Purchase lint cotton and further stipulate that the same is not to be sold, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment as modified to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 13, after line 2, to insert:

Additional 20 per cent increase while on foreign service, $9,400.

Provided, That on and after July 1, 1914, the pay of clerks and messengers at headquarters of territorial departments, tactical divisions, brigades, and service schools, who are citizens of the United States, shall be increased 20 per cent while serving in the Philippine Islands, such service to be computed from the date of departure from the continental limits of the United States to the date of return thereto: Provided further, That the money hereby appropriated for such of said clerks, at $1,200 and $1,000 each per annum, and such of said messengers at $720 each per annum as may be employed and assigned by the Secretary of War to the headquarters of the Philippine Department, districts and posts therein, may, in the discretion of the commanding general, Philippine Department, be expended, in whole or in part, for the employment of Filipinos as clerks at not to exceed $500 each per annum, and messengers at not to exceed $300 each per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay the passage of the pending bill or to interrupt the proceedings, but under the practice of the Senate I avail myself of the opportunity to call attention to some matters which, I think, are very urgent and of pressing importance, and to remind the Senate that on the 13th of March I introduced Senate bill 4893, providing:

That the second sentence in section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, which reads as follows: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That bill was sent to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, where its consideration has been delayed up to this time. I wish to express the hope that it shall not be longer delayed, but that the committee may at a very early date consider and take such action in the matter as the committee sees proper and report it to the Senate.

Mr. President, I greatly regret to find myself in direct antagonism with the opinion of the Senator from Oregon, for whom I have a very great respect, special and personal regard, and in asserting my own opinions I do so with the greatest deference for the patriotism and high purposes of other Senators and personal friends who differ with me.

The patriotic zeal with which an American rushes to the protection of American interests, the fervor with which a representative of the United States defends the interests of the United States against any foreign aggression, is highly commendable and has my sympathy; but the issues in this controversy contain no element of yielding American rights to foreign demands. The repeal of the toll-exemption act involves nothing but the observance of the laws of sound business sense, the observance of treaties, and "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind."

Mr. President, the President of the United States in requesting Congress to repeal the statute exempting coastwise vessels owned by citizens of the United States from the payment of tolls through the Panama Canal is justified by economic justice, by national honor, and by political wisdom.

ECONOMIC JUSTICE.

Ninety millions of our people have taxed themselves to build this canal at an expense of over $350,000,000, and in doing so they have rendered a very great service both to the Atlantic and to the Pacific coasts by opening a means of communication many thousand miles shorter than passing around Cape Horn; they have rendered a vast service both to the Atlantic seacoast and to the Pacific seacoast, which will result necessarily in the most serious, important, and valuable reduction in the rates charged on transcontinental freight, which now is carried exclusively by the railways; and in this respect the whole country has rendered the most important service to that portion of the country lying on the seacoast on the east and on the west; but there is no equity or economic justice in the selfish insistence that a small number of persons with money invested in steamboats in the coast trade should not, when they use this international canal, contribute their pro rata part of the cost of maintenance and interest. Ninety millions of Americans have been exceedingly patriotic in building this canal needed by the Nation, and now less than 9,000 shipowners on the Atlantic and Pacific coast line are demanding as a right the use of this canal without paying for the cost of keeping it in order or interest on the prime cost. It is true these shipowners speak of their boats as "American boats" as if they were owned by 90,000,000 Americans, instead of being owned by one ten-thousandth part of 90,000,000 Americans. One ten-thousandth part of the people—an insignificant fraction—rise up and say, "Our American boats must have free passage; our American rights are invaded. Senators and Congressmen and the President of the United States who oppose us are un-American, pro-British, and are traitors to the 'American people.'" Yes; there is a conflict from an economic standpoint between the pocketbook of 1 American and the pocketbooks of 10,000 other Americans, who furnished the money to build the canal. The one American with the coastwise-trade monopoly granted by law, giving him the exclusive right of controlling the coastwise ships, forbidding foreign ships to take any part in the coastwise traffic, has by law a monopoly, is not content with this great advantage—an advantage which I believe is used to his profit and to the injury of all those who pay the freight, which means everybody in the United States. Having a monopoly, he insists upon using the money, sacrifice, and labor of 10,000 other Americans without charge, and denounces the President, who seeks economic justice for the 10,000 whose pockets are to be picked by law, when he asks that the unwise, unjust law be repealed. I am of opinion that the coastwise monopoly should be abolished and our coastwise traffic opened to all ships. They now have a subsidy in being freed from any competition. Certainly we can not afford to further subsidize the coastwise monopoly by free tolls.

There is no common sense or justice in the proposal that one American should have the right to tax 10,000 other Americans for his private benefit. I understand perfectly well how a group of rich men owning a monopoly in coastwise shipping can stir up various organizations and patriotic Irish societies around seaports, whether in New York or San Francisco or Portland or New Orleans. It is the case of the three tailors of Tooley Street, who resolved: "We, the people of England," and so forth. The public sentiment of the United States is based on common sense—honor, wisdom, patriotism—and on established facts, and can not be stampeded by a selfish propaganda nor by the expenditure of large amounts in advertising or in inspired editorials. Neither can the United States Senate or House of Representatives be stampeded by cajolery or abuse.

The United States has spent over three hundred and fifty millions in building this canal. The interest at 3 per cent will equal ten millions per annum, and it may cost fifteen millions more per annum to keep it in order; and the question is, Who is going to pay for keeping this canal open in international traffic, and what is an equitable and just way in which to meet this burden of annual cost?

It seems fairly well understood that the tonnage for some years can not stand more tax than barely sufficient for maintenance, leaving the interest on the investment as an actual net loss of about a million dollars a month to the citizens of the United States. The total tonnage will amount to about 10,000,000 tons, of which 1,000,000 tons is estimated to be of so-called "coastwise" vessels belonging to United States citizens or corporations.

At 60 cents a ton on an average for the cost of going through the canal, the total amount involved in this subsidy to the coastwise vessels would amount to $600,000. It is not a very large amount, but I am opposed to the principle of it, and I am opposed to ship subsidies.

I am not surprised that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] brings in his remarkable substitute for the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. The Senator from Illinois presented what I believe to be a Democratic proposal:

Resolved, That in pursuance of the true American doctrine of equal and exact justice to all, special privilege to none, that it is expedient and just that all vessels or tonnage passing through the Panama Canal shall bear and pay a sum of compensation so adjusted as shall compensate for expense and upkeep of the canal.

And I would say, if it were permissible, that it should also cover the interest upon the investment made out of the taxes exacted from the people of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. As the Senator has referred to me, unnecessarily, as I think, I observe that the Senator says that the resolution of the Senator from Illinois is the true Democratic doctrine. What about this, Mr. President?—

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

Is that American doctrine? It is the Democratic platform of 1912, on which your President was elected.

Mr. OWEN. I will deal with that in due course of time. I had not failed to observe that interesting plank of the Democratic platform.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; and the President did not fail to notice it when he agreed to it in his campaign speeches.

Mr. OWEN. But I will say that the point of view of the Senator from New Hampshire and my point of view are as far apart as the poles. The Senator from New Hampshire favored ship subsidy before. He fought for it before. He passed it through the Senate once.

Mr. GALLINGER. Two or three times.

Mr. OWEN. Two or three times; but always with my opposition and always with my disapproval.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true; and I hope the Senator in his investigations of this great subject has noticed the developments that were made in the House of Representatives concerning the European ship combines, which are requiring from us a toll infinitely greater than anything that was ever suggested in the way of subsidy for American ships.

Mr. OWEN. The point of view of the Senator from New Hampshire is illustrated by the substitute he offered this morning, to wit:

That in pursuance of the true American doctrine that American interests are safer in the hands of Americans than in the hands of Europeans or other foreign nations—

The Senator by that intends to imply that the President and those of us who differ with the Senator from New Hampshire are in favor of transferring American interests into the hands of Europeans. The Senator ought to know that there is no foundation for any such suggestion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is interpreting language that I used which he has no right to interpret in the way he does. I have made no assault whatever upon the President.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be pleased to have the Senator disclaim the natural meaning that attaches to these, his own, words.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Hampshire will interpret his own language, and he does not at all agree with the proposition that the Senator from Oklahoma shall attack him in this way. I perfectly understand what that language means and at the proper time I shall endeavor to present it to the Senate.

If it does not agree with the view of the Senator from Oklahoma, that is possibly my misfortune and possibly the misfortune of the Senator from Oklahoma.

I do not see why the Senator should arraign me so violently to-day because I have offered a resolution which will have the consideration of the Senate, and probably the consideration of a committee of the Senate, before it is acted upon.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, when the Senator from New Hampshire offers a resolution to the Senate, that resolution is subject to criticism by those who compose this body. I am not invading his rights when I take the plain language of the resolution offered by him and put a fair and just interpretation upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma further yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. This matter is to be discussed, I apprehend, to-morrow morning. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who takes the view that the Senator from Oklahoma does, proposes to discuss the resolution. I may have a few words to submit in behalf of the substitute I presented. They will be civil words. They will not arraign any other Senator, nor will they question his motives.

I submit that the manner in which the Senator from Oklahoma is discussing this substitute at the present time, prior to the time it would naturally come up for consideration, is not to his credit.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma is well within his rights in criticizing this improper language of the substitute offered by the Senator from New Hampshire; and if his manner is not agreeable to the Senator from New Hampshire, that is the misfortune of the Senator from Oklahoma. It may be due, perhaps, to his natural constitution that his manner is not more agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no question about that.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Oklahoma, when he feels a matter strongly, has no hesitation in putting into his manner the sentiment which he entertains.

The view of the Senator from New Hampshire and the view of the Senator from Oklahoma are as far apart upon questions of this kind as the North Pole is from the South Pole. The Senator from New Hampshire believes in ship subsidy. The Senator from New Hampshire, in season and out of season, has been fighting for ship subsidy. I say, however, that that is Republican doctrine and is not Democratic doctrine, and I say such a doctrine had no proper place in a Democratic platform. I say it is contrary to the opinions and the teachings of the body of the Democracy for very many years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes; I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. The distinguished Secretary of State, who I believe is the patron saint of the Senator from Oklahoma, says that a man who violates a party platform is a criminal, worse than a man who embezzles money. Perhaps the Senator from Oklahoma can square himself with that declaration of Mr. William J. Bryan.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Oklahoma will find occasion to square himself and to explain with great precision his attitude with regard to that matter. There is no difficulty about it. It sometimes happens that a man is in a position where he is compelled to take a choice of evils; and when that is the case, a wise man will choose the least of two evils.

The Senator from New Hampshire puts in his proposed substitute resolution the following:

That there is neither necessity nor justice in repealing the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act, the purpose of the exemption being to aid American shipping in its unequal contest with the subsidized shipping of other countries, which will probably include the payment of tolls by those Governments on their vessels passing through the canal.

That is the Republican view. It is not my view. In my opinion, it is not the view of the great body of the Democracy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is very kind to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator, with pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Other nations are paying, in the aggregate, $46,907,220 as subsidies to their ships.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some of those nations are paying out of their treasuries the tolls through the Suez Canal.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it inconceivable—is it not rather very probable—that those same nations will pay the tolls through the Panama Canal on their vessels? Yet I apprehend the Senator, who is so violently opposed to subsidies to American ships, would not agree that we should vote from the Treasury an amount sufficient to pay the tolls of our ships through the Panama Canal, would he?

Mr. OWEN. I would not agree to a subsidy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is precisely what I said in my resolution—that there is an unequal contest going on between the shipping of foreign countries and our own, which is true.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator believes in the subsidizing of ships, and I take it he regards that as good Democratic doctrine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no, Mr. President; I would not venture to become the exponent of Democratic doctrine. I would not be willing to undertake that impossible task, because I do not believe the Democratic Party has any doctrine to-day. [Laughter.] It certainly is not standing by the doctrine of its platform.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator, of course, will concede that the remission of tolls is the same thing as a subsidy, will he not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, it is exactly the same; and when England agreed with this country, and went into a commercial agreement with us, that we should not impose anything upon English shipping that England did not impose upon ours, and in that way caused us to give up the differential duties' principle of the Democratic Party in its earlier and better days, England immediately subsidized her shipping and indirectly violated the agreement she made with this country.

Mr. OWEN. I will tell the Senator, incidentally, that while the Democratic Party has had earlier days it never had better days than now; and the Democratic Party has been for very many years opposed to subsidies. The Democratic Party has been opposed to taking money out of the taxes of the people and giving it to a few men who happen to have boats plying along the coast.

Mr. President, either the ships of the world, including ships owned by United States citizens, using the canal will pay enough to meet the cost of maintenance and interest in the future, or they will not. If foreign ships alone meet the cost, and the ships belonging to one ten-thousandth part of our citizenship are not required to pay toll, then it means that the cost is imposed on the citizens of other nations, and in that way citizens of other nations not only will pay their own full share of the cost, but they will be asked also to pay the cost which, in equity, should fall proportionately on American citizens. Foreign citizens then must pay not only their proportionate part, but also the American citizens' proportionate part. If there be a deficit, however, the deficit is not paid by citizens of other nations, it must be paid from our own Treasury, which on this theory will pay from public funds the proportionate part of our own citizen shipowners and the deficit besides.

The precise effect of this transaction from any point of view is that the United States, under toll exemption, is giving a subsidy to vessels owned by citizens of the United States who use the Panama Canal.

It has the same identical effect, so far as the National Treasury is concerned, to give such shipowners a direct subsidy out of the Treasury from taxes collected from other citizens of the United States.

It is a form of special privilege which is flatly opposed to every principle of democratic teaching. It is taking away money from the many and giving it to the few, and in this case giving the most of it to a few having a monopoly in coastwise transportation.

If the doctrine of giving a subsidy is recognized by the people of the United States as wise and economically just, it would be better for our foreign relations to give the subsidy directly out of our Treasury on the theory of encouraging shipping, and in this contingency we should not charge foreign vessels with more than their proportionate part of the cost of up-keep and interest. We can not wisely attempt to give a subsidy to a few American citizens at the expense of the citizens of every other nation. Such conduct would put the United States in a bad attitude with every nation of the world, who would recognize the obvious injustice of such conduct.

It is not the amount involved which is most important, for it will only involve six or eight hundred thousand per annum to American citizens, but it is the false principle of a subsidy to private interests at public expense which is so objectionable.

I am opposed to subsidies either direct or indirect, and I am opposed to this toll exemption to ships owned by American citizens, because it means a special privilege and indirect subsidy. It means taxing the many for the benefit of the few. It is economically wrong. It is getting something for nothing.

The shallow contention that the monopolists who control the coastwise shipping of the United States will make haste to return this subsidy to the shippers of freight is too preposterous for words. It violates the fundamental canons of commercial life, of the practice of business men, who, in business, make what they can and keep what they get.

THE NATIONAL HONOR.

It is of supreme importance to the United States that the whole world and every nation of the world should regard the United States as maintaining the highest possible standard of honor and rectitude of conduct. If the other nations of the world have just ground to think that the toll exemption is a violation either of the letter or the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901, the Senate would do an infinite harm to the prestige of the United States if it showed itself indifferent to that opinion.

The President of the United States in his message has assured us that the representatives of other nations entertain the view that the toll exemption is not justified under that treaty, and we should critically inquire as to whether or not this expression of opinion has any justification.

In my own opinion the toll exemption is a plain violation of both the letter and the spirit of the treaty.

We have sovereignty and control over the canal and can exercise it, but having agreed to keep the canal free and open on terms of entire equality to the citizens of other nations, we are bound by treaty as well as by economic justice to keep the agreement.

Mr. President, the treaty of November 18, 1901 (57th Cong., 1st sess., S. Doc. No. 85, p. 21), adopted the rules of equal rights to the citizens of all nations governing the Suez Canal under the convention of Constantinople, October 28, 1888, and further provided, more expressly (art 3, sec. 1):

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The United States, in providing toll exemption for the ships belonging to certain of its own citizens, thereby discriminates in favor of such citizens and is driven to argue that "all nations" does not include the United States, although it includes Great Britain and every other nation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator think we are compelled, under the terms of the clause of the treaty he has just read, to admit the war vessels of Japan and of the United States to the canal on the same terms that we admit our own vessels?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

The contention that the United States is not one of the nations referred to is, in my opinion, absurd. It would put the United States in a false light throughout the world.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I am impressed with the belief that the Senator from Oklahoma misunderstood the question of the distinguished Senator from Oregon, and answered without qualification what he did not mean, not understanding and apprehending, I think, what the Senator from Oregon had in his mind. The Senator from Oklahoma, if I did not misunderstand him, answered that under the provision referred to and quoted by him the warships, the battleships of foreign nations would be allowed to come through the canal upon the same equal terms as the merchant marine; but he did not mean to imply that that was to apply in time of war.

Mr. OWEN. I was not discussing war.

Mr. LEWIS. The question and answer as left might have made the impression that they did upon many of the Senators, and I knew the Senator from Oklahoma did not mean that.

Mr. OWEN. I perfectly well understood what the Senator from Oregon said, and I perfectly well answered it just as far as I cared to answer it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to ask when these six rules which are provided for under subdivision 3 apply, if not in time of war. When do we apply the principle of neutralization except in time of war?

Mr. OWEN. Answering that suggestion from the Senator from Idaho, I will say that the neutralization referred to in this treaty is the neutralization expressly set forth in article 8 of the Bulwer-Clayton treaty of 1850, which does not deal with questions of war at all, but deals with the question of free and equal use of that canal on free and equal terms in times of peace and in war, with possible limitations. That is the neutralization referred to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is not neutralization, nor is it neutrality.

Mr. OWEN. Mr President, I understand the use of language quite as well as the Senator from Idaho. I understand perfectly well what neutralization means under the declaration of various judges on the bench who have considered the question of neutralization when they have dealt with questions of war. I also understand that the English language, when it uses the term "neutralization" in connection with making neutral the charges for use of a canal, means exactly what it says; and it can not be misinterpreted by some interpretation of the word "neutralization" used by some judge on the bench who has interpreted the word "neutralization" in relation to war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for a suggestion, the proposition of equality of use or equal tolls and the proposition of neutralization do not depend at all upon what some judge has said. The term "neutralization" has been defined so often by text-writers upon the subject and by people discussing the subject that I did not suppose it was open to discussion. I have seen no discussion of this treaty by anyone who applied the term "neutralization" otherwise than as it has always been applied with reference to such matters.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, well, then, if that be held true, the use of the term "principle of neutralization" in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has no meaning to the Senator in times of peace.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator another question: Does the Senator contend that the other five rules under subdivision 3 apply to the United States the same as he claims rule 1 applies?

Mr. OWEN. I claim that the several subsections of article 3 should be interpreted in the plain, common-sense meaning which they ought to have.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President, the question I ask is whether rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 apply to the United States in the same sense as the Senator is now contending that rule 1 does?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am not going to be diverted into discussing rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6. I am now discussing the question of mere neutralization; and I say that the meaning of the term "neutralization" in the convention of 1907, as used in relation to article 8, is beyond any reasonable doubt. It is easy enough for anyone, in reading it, at once to observe its necessary meaning. I shall presently read that section, and then I shall comment upon it and show that the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho has no force whatever.

Mr. BORAH. It is not necessary to read the rules to show that. All that is necessary is for the Senator from Oklahoma to say so.

Mr. OWEN. I meant to say that when I come to that section of article 8 I will explain more fully, and I shall reach it in just a moment if the Senator will permit me to make an argument with some degree of coherency, without being sidetracked with the discussion of a variety of things which have no direct relation to the matter I am presenting.

Now, Mr. President, if the United States should contend that it was not one of the nations referred to in article 3, section 1, it would put the United States in a false light throughout the world, and, having dealt inequitably by making an unjust and an unwise discrimination, we are then put in the worse attitude of contending that our own treaty, which we drew ourselves, pledging the canal on free and open terms to the citizens of all nations, does not include the United States. No wonder the representatives of foreign powers diplomatically suggest to the President of the United States that this act of Congress passed by the Senate and House of Representatives August 24, 1912, and approved by the President of the United States (37 Stat., 562, sec. 5) is a violation of the treaty with Great Britain.

It is a very delicate thing to tell the President of the United States that his predecessor and Congress have made such a serious mistake, and, no overt act having yet occurred, nothing more than a suggestion can be made that this act ignores a treaty obligation in providing that "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States." (It is otherwise provided that foreign vessels shall not engage in the coastwise trade of the United States.) Therefore, in effect the law provides for discrimination against foreign vessels passing through the Panama Canal, which are taxed and not permitted to go through the canal on terms of entire equality with certain American vessels.

The provision of the treaty, to wit, "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable," is violated when the ships of citizens of the United States pass through the canal without any charge, because free passage is not imposing a "just and equitable charge" as the treaty contemplates.

It is easy to understand the full significance of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by reviewing its history and considering the convention of 1850.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, was regarded as a wise piece of American diplomacy, because Great Britain joined the United States, when the United States was not strong, in an agreement to promote an interoceanic canal across the isthmus between the Americas, and to protect it. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty bristles with the importance of promoting the interoceanic canal upon the terms of equality to the citizens of all nations, and emphasizes this principle in article 8, to wit:

ARTICLE 8.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by their article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

In the subsequent treaty of 1901 reference is made to the "neutralization" established by this article 8, showing that the neutralization referred to there refers to the equality of right to pass through that canal. And it should be remembered that this very article 8, establishing the general principle of neutralization, as set forth in article 8, was reasserted in the preamble of the treaty of November 18, 1901.

Senator Bacon, of Georgia, on December 16, 1901, moved the following amendment, to wit:

In the preamble strike out all of the words after "United States" in the tenth line down to and including the word "convention" in line 11.

In other words, he moved to strike out the words of the preamble, as follows:

Without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

Here is language referring to the general principle of "neutralization" established in article 8 of the convention of 1850, which article only provides for impartiality in canal tolls, and so forth, toward citizens of all nations. It has no reference to war or the principle of neutrals as understood in war, but has reference to the management of the canal being conducted as a neutral would in times of war.

The term "neutral" means neither for nor against. The term "neutral" means dealing dispassionately, without partiality to one or to the other. The term "neutralize" means to make neutral, and the word "neutralization" means the act of making neutral. The act of making neutral referred to in article 8 means the act of making neutral, and without partiality or discrimination, the charges for going through this canal to the citizens of all nations.

The plain, simple language above quoted, "the principle of neutralization as established in article 8 of this convention," can have only one common-sense meaning, and that is making neutral, impartial, and without discrimination the canal tolls.

The Senate of the United States refused to strike out the words I have read. I call the attention of the Senate to that fact. Senator Bacon moved to strike them out and the Senate of the United States refused to strike out these words recognizing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention by a vote of 18 to 60. Among distinguished Democrats voting against striking out this principle of neutralization would be found Senators Cockrell and Vest, of Missouri; Senators Foster and McEnery, of Louisiana; Senators Morgan and Pettus, of Alabama; and Senator Jones, of Arkansas, the leader of the Democrats of the Senate at that time and the chairman of the Democratic conference, and Senator MARTIN of Virginia. But the important fact is that 60 Senators out of 78 voted against striking out the general principle of neutralization established in article 8, and this treaty with the principle of neutralization renewed was confirmed by 72 Senators to 6 against it when it came before the Senate for action in executive session.

Senator McLaurin, of Mississippi, December 16, 1901, proposed to strike out of article 3 the following words, fixing the rates on equal terms:

Substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

Again the Senate of the United States refused to change this principle proposed to be written into the convention of 1901, and by a viva voce vote rejected Senator McLaurin's motion. There were not enough Senators in favor of it to justify a recorded vote by yeas and nays. The United States thus gave notice to all the world of the almost unanimous opinion of the Senate of the United States that the general principle of neutralization or "equal terms" to the citizens of all nations established in article 8 of the convention of 1850 was intended to be retained. Article 8 of the convention of 1850 provided that the canal should be open to the citizens of the United States and Great Britain and of all other States on equal terms. We reaffirmed it in 1901.

It is a denial of equal terms to charge the citizens of Great Britain and to exempt from charge the citizens of the United States.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty contemplated that the interoceanic canal would be constructed by private parties or corporations, and contained an agreement that neither the United States nor Great Britain would ever obtain or maintain for itself "any exclusive control over the said ship canal."

When the United States began to contemplate building the canal itself it became necessary to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer convention of 1850, and this was sought to be accomplished by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

When the first draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was submitted to the Senate, Mr. Bard, of California, December 13, 1900, moved to substitute the following:

ARTICLE 3.

The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

There was a proposal for this very discrimination. There was this very proposal offered to "discriminate in favor of coastwise vessels." Was it written into the treaty? No; it was rejected by a vote of 43 to 23. The Senate of the United States not only did not give a two-thirds vote in favor of such discrimination, but gave almost a two-thirds vote against it. It was defeated by 43 nays to 23 yeas. So that it appears that the whole world, looking at our conduct and having before it Senate Document No. 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, published in 1902, knew that the Senate of the United States had refused to amend the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by inserting an amendment recognizing the right to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in coastwise trade (Dec. 17, 1900, p. 16), and that the Senate had also, by an overwhelming vote, refused to strike out the provision of the treaty in the preamble of the convention of November 18, 1901, reaffirming the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the convention of 1850.

With such a record before us we could not face the world and interpret the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as permitting discrimination. We refused to put in a provision recognizing discrimination on December 17, 1900; we had recognized the doctrine in the Clayton-Bulwer convention of 1850 for 50 years for equal terms to the citizens of all nations; we recognized it again in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, confirmed by 72 Senators to 6, and we refused to strike out of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the neutralization agreed upon in 1850.

PRECEDENTS.

Mr. President, we have some precedents where we took the exact opposite view and claimed that Canada had no right to give rebates or preference to certain Canadian vessels passing through the Welland Canal, which Canada claimed the right to do by remitting the Welland Canal tolls to Canadian coastwise vessels with goods bound for Montreal and points east. The contention that the Welland Canal is within the coast limits is sound.

The argument that the Panama Canal is a coastwise canal for coastwise vessels is a strained construction. It is over 1,500 miles from Galveston to Panama, and still farther from Panama to Los Angeles. Is Hawaii also a part of our coast line, and Guam and the Philippines?

Great Britain could, owning India and the British Isles, with about as much propriety, claim exemption for her coastwise vessels going through the Suez Canal as a coastwise canal. In point of fact, the charges of the Suez Canal upon the boats belonging to citizens of all nations are the same.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just on that point, I will ask the Senator for information. Is the Suez Canal in any sense a government constructed or a government owned canal?

Mr. OWEN. No; it is not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No.

Mr. OWEN. But the right of equal tolls is maintained by governmental power.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided that the rule of neutrality and equal treatment should inure to all nations of the world, no matter who should own or construct the canal, and in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we adopted article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as the basis of the neutrality and equality of treatment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me, I think the Senator from North Dakota is straining article 8 a little. At the time article 8 was adopted there was no question at all as to a Government owned or constructed canal.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask the Senator to read it. He will find that it says "by whomsoever owned or operated."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But it does not contemplate a Government canal.

Mr. OWEN. We are following the precedent of the Suez Canal in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

THE WELLAND, ST. LAWRENCE, AND OTHER CANALS IN CANADA.

By article 27 of the treaty of Washington, May 8, 1871, Great Britain undertook to secure for citizens of the United States the use of the Welland and other Canadian canals on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion. In 1888 and in 1891 the United States protested because Canada had denied the stipulated equality. This was done by Canada charging 20 cents a ton on grain, flour, and so forth, passing through the Welland Canal to Montreal or points east thereof and giving a rebate of 18 cents a ton. The effect of this system was to make ineffective the stipulated equality, because a like rebate was not granted on transfers of freight made to the United States. The Canadian Government argued, first, that its orders in council, as they applied to Canadian and American vessels alike, did not infringe the treaty. As they applied to Canadian and American vessels alike, it did not infringe the treaty. The United States replied, first, that the treaty guaranteed equality of treatment, not merely to vessels of the United States, but also to their citizens. Second, that this equality was violated by the system in question, since it required grain bound to United States ports to pay ten times as much toll as grain bound to Montreal, and thus discriminated against American vessels, ports, consumers, and trade routes.

The matter was submitted by the President to Congress in a message June 20, 1892, and retaliation was proposed by denying Canadian vessels free passage through the St. Marys Falls Canal. It resulted in Canada abandoning its contention and ceasing any discrimination in favor of Canadian ships, in order that no cause of friction with United States authorities in regard to the matter should exist.

It therefore appears that we had practically the same controversy with Canada, which was giving toll exemption to Canadian ships through the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals while denying like toll exemptions to American vessels or to vessels carrying freight bound for American ports and thus discriminating against the citizens of the United States, and that this controversy was settled in our favor.

The Canadian Government had held in effect that the words "on terms of equality" did not apply to vessels engaged in coastwise commerce and allowed substantial rebates to her own vessels. When we come to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we strengthen this language "on terms of equality" to read "on terms of entire equality."

When Secretary Hay was negotiating in 1899 "the open door in China" the French, the English, and the Germans had territorial concessions in the Chinese Empire, and Russia and Japan, by virtue of their immediate neighborhood, had a great influence there.

Secretary Hay in a note addressed to Germany, Great Britain, Russia, Italy, and China, referring to their cases and agreements with China, requested a formal assurance from each of these nations that within its sphere of influence it would levy no higher harbor dues on vessels of another nationality and no higher charges over lines built or operated within its sphere on merchandise belonging to citizens or subjects of other nationalities transported through such sphere than should be levied on similar merchandise belonging to its own nationals for equal distances, and this request was granted by the powers addressed.

In view of our demand and settled policy, it is obviously entirely inconsistent that we should demand an exemption for our alleged coastwise commerce in order to obtain discriminating favor for ships belonging to Americans which pass through this interoceanic canal, which we have constructed under an agreement with Great Britain, made on behalf, however, of the citizens of all the nations of the world.

It will be remembered, Mr. President, that this great pathway between the Atlantic on the one side and the Pacific on the other must be regarded as an international highway. We can not treat it as a private proposition and say to the whole world, "You shall not cross this continent." We ought not to desire to do that. It has always been regarded as an international work. When the French undertook to construct the canal they were not doing it with a view to making it a private canal. It was expected that it would be open to the ships of all the world; and the common sense of the matter just as much justifies this canal being used as an international highway on equal terms as it justifies the use of the ocean itself as being open to the nations of the world.

Under the convention of 1850 we could not have constructed this canal or acquired a strip of ground across the Panama Isthmus, through which it has been built. And in modifying the convention of 1850 to enable us to acquire the land without violating our treaty with Great Britain we wrote the new agreement with Great Britain, pledging equal treatment to the citizens of other nations, and did this with our eyes wide open, refusing to permit a provision to be inserted authorizing the exemption from tolls of coastwise vessels owned by citizens of the United States.

When, on May 23, 1912 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 7019), the act was passed for establishing the rules for the use of the Panama Canal and its maintenance, the Doremus amendment providing for the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, the yeas were 147 and the nays 127. Of the yea vote there were 74 Democrats and 73 Republicans; 91 Democrats who voted nay and 37 Republicans who voted nay, so that a decided majority of the Democrats were opposed. This was immediately before the Democratic national convention of June 25, 1912.

The highest expression from the Democrats of the Nation was given immediately before the Democratic national convention by this vote in the House of Representatives, and a majority of the Democrats voted against it.

In the Senate on August 6, 1912, after the Democratic platform had been adopted on July 3, 1912, a motion to strike from the bill the toll-exemption provision (p. 10296), 24 Democrats voted against it (19 Democrats not voting), and it is obvious that the Democrats in the Senate were powerfully influenced by the party platform and that the vote of the Democrats in the House, which was May 23, 1912, previous to the platform, was against it.

In all human probability the unfavorable Democratic vote in the House of Representatives had not been analyzed when this plank was inserted in the Democratic platform.

POLITICAL WISDOM.

It is the part of political wisdom to act with the most absolute integrity, with the highest and most delicate sense of honor, and carefully ascertain what this course requires. It is the part of political wisdom, also, to have "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind."

I understand how men of upright and pure purpose may differ as to what this course is, but they will agree upon the importance of a delicate sense of honor in disposing of a question of this character; and the thing which remains to do is to ascertain precisely what is required to be done in considering that principle when we pass upon a treaty of this kind.

If the United States should violate this treaty, or appear to the whole world to be violating this treaty, it would do the American Nation infinite harm. First, it would lead to the retaliation of other nations by having them discriminate against American vessels in every civilized port; and we are just entering upon an era of gigantic world development in which America ought to play a large part.

I pause, Mr. President, to observe that the investments of the United States have been in a very large degree, almost exclusively, I might say, confined to our internal development. We have been building railroads; we have been building factories of all kinds; we have been building cities; we have been building up a great continent; and while we have been using our resources in that way we have earned upon our resources a much higher rate of interest than we would if we had invested our funds in competing with other nations upon the sea.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows what foreign powers have insisted that we are violating the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in making our coastwise shipping free of tolls.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the only one who had a right to make a formal objection was the Government of Great Britain, and they did so. The correspondence has been published as a Senate document.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course we have not any authentic information on this subject. I understand a resolution has been introduced to require that information. But, for instance, I received a letter from a German who said that the United States in its present controversy is making a laughingstock of itself all through Europe, except in Great Britain, where the course was applauded.

Mr. OWEN. I shall not, of course, attempt to analyze the objection of some isolated and unknown German citizen.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has just referred to a Senate document which contains the correspondence between the two countries relating to the Panama Canal tolls. If I am wrong, I want to be set right, because I am very much interested in this part of the discussion; but my recollection is that in that correspondence Great Britain, either directly or indirectly, admitted the right of this Government by way of rebates or subsidies to virtually place the coastwise trade of the United States upon a free basis. Assuming that that is so——

Mr. OWEN. It was to the effect that they might concede it if it could be done, but they insisted that it could not be done.

Mr. THOMAS. It has been some time since I have read that correspondence.

Mr. OWEN. The public prints give only one part of the quotation and omit the more vital part. That is why I added it.

Mr. THOMAS. The impression I formed from reading it at the time was that that concession was made, and I was unable to perceive that that was anything but a distinction without a difference.

Mr. OWEN. The point was, as I understand it, that granting it would cost $15,000,000 to pay the expense of the upkeep of the canal, then if the other vessels of the world were required to pay only their proportionate part of that cost according to tonnage, the United States might in that contingency distribute the difference, as I understand it, among its own ships if it saw fit by subsidy, but it should not impose the whole cost upon ships of other nations, because they thought that it would be an unfair discrimination to put the whole tax of upkeep upon the ships of other nations.

Mr. President, what I started to say was that having developed the United States in a very high degree, having a gigantic volume of resources, we are right at a point where the United States can profitably invest vast amounts in shipping on the sea and do it profitably; and I think it would be a great mistake, just from a material and selfish standpoint, to offend all the nations of the world by putting a construction upon this treaty which they do not believe is just and right. When I say they do not believe our act of toll exemption just and right, I think I have a right to say that, because the President of the United States gave us the plainest possible intimation of it in his address to both Houses when this matter was presented by him to Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In this connection I want to say the best way to arrive at what the foreign people think of our construction of the treaty is from the press in Germany, France, Italy, and elsewhere. An interview lately with the President referred to that also.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it would do us injury in a material way, but it would do us far greater injury in impairing the prestige of the United States and its influence as a world power.

The United States has a gigantic responsibility as a civilizing agency as the representative leading Christian Republic; and for the Nation to disregard the divine law of equity and of the golden rule would be a huge national blunder, a failure to faithfully improve the greatest God-given opportunity in the history of man.

THE OPPOSITION TO REPEAL.

Some patriotic men believe in ship subsidies; some good men of Irish extraction are unwilling to agree to "no exemption" because Great Britain's ambassador asserts the principle; some good men think of the ships belonging to a few citizens of the United States as "American ships," as opposed to British and French and German ships, and therefore entitled to special privilege; and many who oppose the repeal are being influenced to a greater or less degree by an obvious commercial political propaganda throughout the country, which is evidently inspired by selfish interests. Somebody is spending a considerable amount of money in advertising, in getting up meetings, in having editorials and memorials prepared and published. And in the face of economic justice, in the face of national honor, in the face of the plain letter of the treaty, we hear the reiterated demand "for reasons," when the reasons are overwhelming and have been repeatedly given.

A great outcry is made that to repeal this act is a violation of the Democratic national platform of 1912. It is a matter of astonishment, but nevertheless it is actually true, that there appears to have been put into the Democratic national platform of July 3, 1912, the most undemocratic provision for toll exemption, practically for a subsidy, notwithstanding the majority of Democratic Members of Congress had on May 23, 1912, voted against it.

The Democratic platform contains the following clause——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. In just a moment. The language of the platform is:

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

Now I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator from Oklahoma observed that on August 7, 1912, every Democratic Senator who voted voted in favor of exemption from tolls?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes; I observed that and commented on it a few moments ago, pointing out that the Democratic Senators were simply following their party platform, which had just been promulgated at Baltimore. Naturally they followed that which the national convention had just indorsed.

Mr. GALLINGER. On August 7, 1912.

Mr. OWEN. On August 7, 1912, which was a month and seven days after the passage of the resolution in Baltimore.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was; yes. Now, what I am wondering about is why the Senator from Oklahoma should lay such great stress upon the vote in another body and should not lay particular stress upon the vote in this body.

Mr. OWEN. I have explained both. I have explained that the Democratic Members of the other House voted against it before our party platform was adopted and that the Democrats of the Senate immediately after the adoption of the platform supported the platform.

Mr. GALLINGER. Was it not a singular and unexplainable circumstance that the Democratic Party, in view of the vote in the House, should in their national convention put this plank in their platform?

Mr. OWEN. Yes. I have suspected the Senator from New Hampshire of having been present at Baltimore. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not participate in the proceedings, but I recall the circumstance that my old-time friend, whom I greatly respect, Mr. William J. Bryan, had very much to do with forming that platform. I think I am not mistaken on that point.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is the only plank in the platform that the Senator from New Hampshire indorses, is it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I would have to go a long way to indorse any plank in a Democratic platform. [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that some able Democrat who believed in this undemocratic declaration believed that he was serving God and the country in procuring the insertion of these words in the very lengthy Democratic platform of that date.

I do not know where this undemocratic item came from and have not had time to find out. Those who very largely rely on this party plank adopted by the delegates at Baltimore and who know who authorized the insertion of this unhappy declaration ought to be able to explain it. What State convention first expressed this view and where did this item come from? Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals can explain it, as I think he was on the subcommittee on resolutions of the Democratic national convention at Baltimore.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I saw a very lucid and a very able explanation of that declaration some time ago from the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. OWEN. Well, Mr. President, I am very sure it did not come from the State convention of Oklahoma.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] kept the records of that committee, and was an active and important member of it. I think, if the inquiry were addressed to him, he could state with some accuracy how the proposal found its insertion in the platform. For the present I might gratify any anxiety or curiosity——

Mr. OWEN. Curiosity, Mr. President, rather than anxiety.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That the Senator from Oklahoma may have on the subject by referring to the official records of the Baltimore convention. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he was a delegate to that convention?

Mr. OWEN. No; I was not.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And did not attend it?

Mr. OWEN. I was present there for some days.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator from Oklahoma had been officially accredited by his State to the convention, he would, of course, have more complete information regarding the proceedings. The plank in question was considered by a subcommittee, and subsequently considered by the entire committee on resolutions. It had the unanimous support of every member of the committee on resolutions. That committee embraced in its membership several Members of this body. I shall take the liberty, with the Senator's permission, at this time to refer to some of them.

Mr. OWEN. Would the Senator not just insert the entire list?

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator from Oklahoma has no objection, I shall merely call attention to the names of those Senators who were members of the committee. The State of Arkansas was represented by Senator CLARKE, the State of Indiana by Senator KERN, the State of Maryland by former Senator Rayner, the State of Mississippi by Senator VARDAMAN, the State of Montana by Senator WALSH, the State of Nebraska by the present Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan; it was my privilege to represent the State of New York on that committee; Ohio was represented by Senator POMERENE, South Carolina by Senator TILLMAN, Texas by Senator CULBERSON, and Virginia by Senator MARTIN. When, during the course of the convention, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] took the platform to read the resolutions to the convention he said—I now quote from page 365 of the official record of the Democratic national convention at Baltimore in 1912:

> Mr. JOHN W. KERN, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to present to the convention the following report of the committee on resolutions, which resolutions were adopted by the full committee without a dissenting voice.

After the resolutions were read in part by Senator KERN and in part by Senator WALSH, of Montana, no dissenting voice was heard in that convention, and during the weeks that ensued, during the presidential campaign, there was no responsible Democrat in this country who dissented from any declaration of the platform, stress being laid on every hustings that it was little less than criminal to seek public office on pledges which were not to be observed; and in that connection the principal criticism leveled at the Republican Party was that the administration had failed to recognize the pledges upon which it had secured office four years earlier; and to give emphasis to the difference between the practices of the two parties, at the request of certain Democrats who were on that committee, a proposal was made to insert in the declaration of principles—and you will find it inserted—that pledges when made by the Democratic Party are made not only for the purpose of securing office but for the purpose of recognition and enforcement after election.

Mr. JAMES and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. If I recollect the Democratic national platform of 1912 correctly, there is a provision in it which says that all recommendations of judges made to the President should be made public. My understanding is that a report was made by the committee of which the Senator from New York is a member, which struck that provision from the law; and I should like to ask the Senator whether or not he adhered to the Baltimore platform upon that provision?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, no committee of which I am a member has, with my knowledge, disregarded any pledge of the Democratic national convention of 1912. If there has been a disregard or a departure from the pledges of the Democratic Party as found in that platform, I do not know of it.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator from New York will recall that several bills creating new judges have passed through the Senate and the other House of Congress, and been referred, before passing the Senate, to his committee. Did the Senator undertake by amendment to carry out the promises of the Democratic national convention that such recommendations of persons to the President should be made public?

Mr. O'GORMAN. So far as I am aware, Mr. President, no nomination for a judge has come to the Committee on the Judiciary without that committee having presented to it all the papers that at any time had reached the Attorney General in reference to the matter. I presume the papers reaching the Attorney General embrace those which may go to the President, because, so far as I am advised, the uniform practice is for the President to forward to the Attorney General any communications he receives with respect to judicial nominations.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, the Senator from New York misapprehends the issue, as I understand it. The provision of the platform provided that all recommendations made to the President of the United States upon which he acted in making an appointment to the judiciary should be made public. The question I direct to the attention of the Senator is whether or not in creating these new judges the Senator from New York adhered to the national platform of his party and made a part of the law creating such judgeships the provision that the President of the United States should make public all recommendations made to him for the judgeship?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have answered that question, Mr. President; but I desire to add one word to what I have already said, which is, that it is a poor defense of disloyalty to a party obligation to call attention to the fact that there have been other departures from the pledges made by the party.

Mr. JAMES. However, Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky for just a moment.

Mr. JAMES. It may be a poor defense, but it seems to me that it is quite as poor a defense upon the part of the Senator from New York to cling tenaciously to one principle in the Democratic platform and neglect in legislation other principles in the Democratic platform.

Mr. THOMAS, Mr. O'GORMAN, and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask the Senator from New York a question. I have discovered in the Democratic platform a plank pledging the party to rigid economy in public expenditures, and I should like to inquire whether at Baltimore there was any dissent from that plank in the platform when it was reported out of the committee?

Mr. O'GORMAN. None at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. While our Democratic friends are looking around for the pieces of their platform, I want to read a statement which may compose their differences. I read from the platform adopted by the Democratic convention at Baltimore in 1912:

> Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. While we are calling attention to the rigid observance of the planks of the Democratic platform, the observance of which is really the exception rather than the rule, I want to call attention to another plank in the Democratic platform:

> We demand for the people of Alaska the full enjoyment of the rights and privileges of a territorial form of government, and we believe that the officials appointed to administer the government of all our Territories and the District of Columbia should be qualified by previous bona fide residence.

Nominations are being made to office in Alaska of gentlemen who have never been within three or four thousand miles of that Territory.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I do not wish to pursue this matter further. I am sure that this item did not come from the State convention of Oklahoma, and I do not recall where a majority in any number of Democratic State conventions have expressed themselves on this question, or, indeed, whether any of them have done so, although it would not be difficult for a few citizens desiring this privilege at public expense to have had perhaps such a clause inserted by some misinformation in some of the conventions in States bordering on the coast. I should like to ask the Senator from New York, if he knows, whether any State convention did pass upon this matter?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not know that any State convention passed upon it, but I do know that for a period of six or eight weeks the Committee on Interoceanic Canals while considering the bill which was then pending for the government of the Panama Canal had before it citizens from every section of the United States, calling attention to the grinding monopoly of the transcontinental railroads, and pointing out that the only way the people of the country could escape from the exactions of the transcontinental railroads and the British syndicate now in control of the Tehauntepec Railroad was first to exclude from the canal all boats controlled by railroads, so that railroads could not have control of a competing water line, it being the observation of every student of economics that no railroad in this country ever had control of a competing water line without destroying competition.

In that same connection it was pointed out that the best way to compel the transcontinental railroads of this country to reduce their freight rates to a proper basis was to make it possible for the boats using the canal to go through at a minimum cost of expenditure, so that cheap water transportation would necessitate cheaper transportation by the competing railroads.

For 30 years the railroads of this country opposed the construction of the Panama Canal. Every time the Government made an effort to construct the canal it encountered the formidable opposition of the railroads. Their opposition was presented to our committee; indeed, they were the only ones in opposition to the bill; and it was largely because of that information and the impression produced on some of us with respect to the exactions of the railroads that I deemed it prudent and others deemed it prudent to have a declaration such as was inserted in the Democratic platform. A similar declaration was inserted in the platform of the Progressive Party. I think that was one of the most commendable principles to which the Democratic Party in 1912 committed itself. The difficulties that we have encountered for the last 30 years with the railroads are still with us. They still hope that cheap water transportation, even after the opening of the canal, will be made impossible. I believe, as one Senator, that they will be disappointed.

The Senator from Oklahoma referred to the interests of the coast States. If I permitted my judgment, representing the people of the United States on the floor of the Senate, to be influenced by local considerations, my interest would be with the railroads, the most powerful factor in the country; but I am as indifferent to the power and influence of the railroads of this country as I am to any other influence that may attempt to trammel my judgment or dictate to me what my action may be on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask both the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from New York—and I do not care which one answers the question—whether or not the Interstate Commerce Commission was not created for the express purpose of compelling reasonable railroad rates from one point to another in the United States——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment, until I finish my sentence—and whether or not the Interstate Commerce Commission is impotent now as a power to enforce, without any outside influence whatever, just and fair rates between one ocean and the other, and whether or not it is necessary to bribe a monopoly in the United States in the shape of granting them a commission in order to make other transportation lines give us just and fair rates?

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I answer the question?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should say, Mr. President, that among the witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals two years ago were Judge Prouty and Mr. Lane, who at that time were members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Lane being now Secretary of the Interior. The question suggested by the Senator was put to both of those commissioners, and their judgment, as sworn to and as found in the testimony of the hearings, was that the only effective way to prevent railroad monopoly of the canal was to exclude from the use of the canal every boat in which any railroad might have any interest. It was largely in deference to their expert judgment that the committee inserted that provision in the act which is now sought to be changed.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Oklahoma will yield one moment longer——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. No matter what any judge may say, no matter what may be the view of any individual, the fact remains that we created a commission for the very purpose of compelling all the railroads to give us just and fair rates, and we put within the hands of that commission all authority necessary to make its power effective. The Senator from New York does not deny, nor can any Senator deny, that authority lies within the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce fair and just rates for the transportation of both passengers and property, and, having that power, if they fail to exercise it, if they acknowledge their inability to put it into effect, then they ought to send in their resignations and allow the President to appoint those who would put the law into effect.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator think there are no abuses to-day with respect to the railroads of the country?

Mr. McCUMBER. If there are any abuses to-day in reference to rates, the place to fight out those abuses and to eradicate them is before the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has full power and authority to eliminate the abuses.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does not the Senator observe by adopting the plan which we have incorporated in the Panama Canal act, and which we were advised to follow by Mr. Lane and Judge Prouty, that we have prevented the possibility of an abuse, while the best that can be accomplished by the Interstate Commerce Commission is to correct abuses after they develop?

Mr. McCUMBER. We not only have the ability to correct abuses after they have developed, but by proper orders we can prevent abuses through the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission. All that we seek, Mr. President, and all we ought to ask, is that rates be just and fair, and we ought not by the use of money or by the use of favors paid out of the pockets of the American people put it in the hands of one corporation to force another corporation to lower its rates when we have the authority in our own hands to deal with the situation.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me one further word?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I merely desire to supplement the reasons I offered a moment ago with regard to the economic phases of this question by calling atttention to the very persuasive reasons offered by Mr. Wilson on August 15, 1912, when he said:

> One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports * * * and have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific or down the coast of South America. * * *
> One of the bills pending, passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House, provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. OWEN. I hope Senators will not unduly prolong the discussion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely wish to add a sentence, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that is this, that I was not attempting to go into what the President has said or what he has not said. What I have stated is that it is not necessary for the American public to pay the coastwise-trade monopoly a million dollars to secure the end desired in connection with railroad rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to say just a word in response to the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota. His view of the functions and powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission is technically correct, but the American people never have relied upon those powers for the correction of all the abuses of transportation. If so, it would then be our policy to allow all the railroad companies of this country to combine or consolidate and expect the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect us against excessive rates or abuses of transportation.

We all know that as an aid, a necessary aid, and supplemental to the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, we must introduce into the business all the competitive factors we can; and there is no more reason for eliminating competition on sea than there would be for eliminating all competition on land. I would rather expect to hear the Senator from North Dakota favor the policy of combining all the railroad companies of the country into one corporation and into one board of directors because we might look to the Interstate Commerce Commission for any relief against unjust or excessive rates.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. OWEN. I should like to say that while I will yield to the Senator from Kentucky I am really trespassing upon the good nature of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who has the Army appropriation bill in charge, and I hope I may not be in the way much longer. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JAMES. Just briefly, in order that we may be accurate upon the question of making public the recommendations made to the President upon which he makes appointments, I wish to say that the Democratic platform says:

> And we commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations, verbal and written, upon which presidential appointments are made.

The purpose of that recommendation was to indorse the action of the House in passing what is known as the Cullop amendment, which provided that in the appointment of judges all recommendations should be made public by the President. The House of Representatives during the month of May, 1913, had under consideration House bill 32, which provided for an additional district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. The House amended that bill as follows:

> Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge.

That amendment was adopted and the bill came to the Senate. It went to the Judiciary Committee, of which the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is a member. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate reported it back to the Senate with a recommendation that the amendment should be stricken from the bill. The House refused to recede from its amendment. Conference committees were appointed, and finally the Senate had its way and the House was forced to yield on that amendment, which was in accordance with the Democratic national platform.

The amendment was reported from a committee of which the Senator from New York was a member. I should like to know whether or not the Senator from New York voted for that amendment, and I should like to have him tell us who made the motion to strike out that amendment, which was made in accordance with the provisions of the Democratic platform.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have no recollection of the incident. I am very sure the question never came up at a meeting of the Judiciary Committee when I was present. Knowing how regular in his attendance the junior Senator from Kentucky is, and knowing what a keen regard he has for party pledges, I marvel that he ever allowed the Senate to pass a bill in disregard of pledges made by the Democratic Party in Baltimore in 1912.

Mr. JAMES. I wish to say, in reply to that, that I will not plead that I was not present at the meeting of the committee, because it was not my duty to be there. I was not a member of the committee. My information, however—and I would not challenge anything the Senator from New York may say—is that a disclosure of the proceedings of the Judiciary Committee would show that the Senator himself made the motion to strike from that bill this amendment. In regard to myself, and as to why I did not make——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I beg to say here that the statement, if the Senator makes it on his own responsibility——

Mr. JAMES. I told the Senator I did not personally know the facts, but I was informed.

Mr. O'GORMAN (continuing). Is absolutely unfounded, and is nothing but a fabrication by the person who invented it.

Mr. JAMES. I did not say the Senator made it. I said I had that information; as to its accuracy I do not know. Of course if the Senator disavows it, I very cheerfully accept his word, as I do the statement that he was not present when the Judiciary Committee, of which he is a member, considered the bill.

In response to the statement of the Senator that I should have made a protest in the Senate, my record in the House speaks for me. I voted for the amendment in the House providing that these recommendations should be made public. It was indorsed by the Democratic national convention. I have no knowledge of the passage of the bill in the Senate. If I had been present, I should have very promptly entered my protest against a surrender of this Democratic doctrine.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. OWEN. I am obliged to ask permission to proceed.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma to yield to me for just a moment.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator, then; but I hope other Senators will not appeal to me to yield any more. I will take only a few moments more to finish what I have to say.

Mr. NELSON. If Republican testimony is of any value in this Chamber, I beg leave to say that I never knew a blinder follower than the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] of the Democratic platform with reference to the currency question. I really felt that in his innermost heart—I do not want to do him an injustice—he felt it would have been for the best interests of the country to have had one large central bank instead of a multiplicity of smaller banks; but the Democratic platform was constantly on his mind. He quoted it in season and out of season, and I thought he slept with it day and night. [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I was calling attention to the Democratic platform with regard to this matter of toll exemption. Since very great pressure is brought upon party members to the effect that they should follow the Democratic platform, I am curious to know what was the real authority for inserting this plank in the platform itself.

My State did not consider this as any part of the Democratic principle or doctrine. It was not considered in Oklahoma. I do not think it was considered in Nebraska or Missouri or Texas or similar States. I thought perhaps some State did pass a resolution which caused delegates representing that State to offer the matter before the committee.

I do not question in any way the high purpose and good sentiment of the gentlemen who were members of that committee; I am not to be interpreted in any such way as that; but when I am called on to make my choice between a broad Democratic principle which opposes special privilege, as I understand it, and a particular detail found in one or two lines in a plank put into a platform, I do think I am not trespassing too far if I make an inquiry as to where it came from. Some State probably had in its convention passed such a resolution, and it was offered. I shall be glad if the Senator from New York will tell us about where it did come from.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator from Oklahoma needs any further information, I commend him to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who kept a record of the hearings and who is now present.

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Senator from New York for his illuminating explanation.

Mr. President, I can not recall where a single Democratic State convention declared in favor of this provision, and I believe there was not one. I have myself attended many national conventions. I have seen many things put in platforms. I confess that I have contributed occasionally to putting things in platforms.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator permit just a word right there?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator states that he has seen no instance where it was in a State platform; but I will say it was spoken from many, many platforms in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and with a good deal of vehemence.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, unfortunately, in the United States, under a system of party government, under the convention system, the platforms expressing the opinions in the name of party membership throughout the land are finally left to a very few men. If they make a mistake in putting some detail into the platform not based on approved party principles, it does not follow that the entire party membership is bound or that Senators representing States are bound to follow the declaration of some able gentleman who happened, by the contingency of caucus action of State convention, to finally find himself where he could write something approved by himself or by some of his constituents into the national platform, without objection, at a time of great confusion.

Delegates to party conventions are often party workers, complimented by their election as delegates to the national convention, who go to shout and "root" and intrigue for some favorite candidate for the Presidency. All attention is concentrated on candidates, and planks put in the platform are shaped by a small subcommittee, with but little debate, in great haste and confusion, and action on very many items in a few hours. No wonder if an error occur under such conditions. I assume, of course, that the subcommittee assented; but I do not believe they realized the error it involved, and I do not doubt the committee was greatly influenced by the fact that the House of Representatives (a Democratic House) had passed the toll-exemption provision, and that the committee was not aware that a majority of the Democrats in the House were opposed to this provision. When the error is used to attract votes, such an error becomes more grievous and embarrassing to faithful men who have with sincerity used the plank to secure support. When the error is discovered, we are face to face with a choice of evils. Each man must determine for himself which horn of the dilemma he prefers.

The people of the United States recognize the Democratic Party as standing for certain great principles of "equal rights," certain fundamental principles of government, "equal rights to all and special privilege to none," and they judge that party as a whole and trust that party in comparison with other parties, according to the general principles of the platform, but, above all, according to the leadership of the party, and when there is a conflict between the fundamentals of the Democracy and a phrase inserted in a platform which is in conflict with the principles of the party. I feel entirely justified, as a member of the party, in disregarding the letter and complying with the spirit of the platform and of the Democracy itself. If there is any real principle for which the Democracy above all else is distinguished, it is its life-long historic opposition to privilege, opposition to the right of the few to tax the many for the benefit of the few, opposition to the right of the few to enrich themselves at the expense of the many.

I do not wish to be understood as indicating that those who favor this provision of the Democratic platform were inspired by any other than the highest possible purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to say that for a long time it has been a principle of the Democratic Party to stand in opposition to the encouragement of monopoly by subsidy.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; that is true. Opposition to the encouragement of monopoly by subsidy is another principle of the Democracy. As our platform very properly says in the preamble, it is a platform of principles. The writing of minor details into the body of a platform is not in proper form, and ought not to be done. Platforms ought to be principles, and not contain minor details.

I wish to say, however, that those who have favored the insertion of this provision in the platform in such language, conflicting as it does with what I conceive to be the principles of Democracy, can not by any such language bind my conscience or my vote. Moreover, Mr. President, granting that there was no objection otherwise, I think that the discovery since this platform was adopted that this part of it was regarded by other nations as a violation of the treaty, the discovery since the Baltimore convention that other nations regard this plank as lacking in fidelity to national promises, the discovery that the President of the United States is embarrassed in dealing with other nations by virtue of this interpretation of the act of 1912, regardless of the issue of the party platform of July 3, 1912, brings about a new state of facts which justifies any Democrat in conscientiously favoring the repeal of this act which is embroiling us with other nations, and doing mischief to our national administration.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I should like the Senator to tell me what other nations, aside from Great Britain, are questioning the good faith of the United States in carrying out its treaty obligations.

Mr. OWEN. It seems to me I have heard that query before. I will say to the Senator that Great Britain is the only nation with which we have an express treaty with regard to this matter, but the rights of other nations are involved in the treaty. When the President of the United States indicates to Congress in his message that he has received this suggestion from other nations it suffices for me, even if the Senator from Washington continues to insist upon some formal declaration as to this nation or that nation or the other nation. I do not feel any doubt whatever that the President of the United States has spoken the truth; and, believing that he has spoken the truth, I do not feel that an inquiry of that nature is justified. Any nation, such as the French Republic or the German Empire, would not feel justified in going further than a verbal diplomatic suggestion, which ought not to be attempted to be put in writing, because it is extremely difficult to write in words a conversation after it has occurred, even if it were proper to be done. A thoughtful and prudent man would not attempt to put in writing words which occurred in a conversation between him and some other man after a lapse of time.

A nation which is not a party to the treaty has no right in any contingency to be making any formal protest, but it can make a diplomatic suggestion to the effect that it does not regard the interpretation as justified. It would be grossly improper for the President to be placed in the attitude of saying what this ambassador or that ambassador or minister had said to him, and he should not be urged to do so.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator know whether or not any nation other than Great Britain has, as a matter of fact, made diplomatic representations, either orally or otherwise, to the United States Government with reference to this matter?

Mr. OWEN. I know nothing more in regard to this matter than the statement of the President of the United States in his message, which is sufficient for me.

Mr. President, I do not believe any State in this Union, including New York and including New Jersey, if this issue were placed before it, would vote in favor of retaining in the law this toll exemption. The people of this country are always moved by considerations of prudence and of common justice. When they read this treaty and read this history, and hear what the President has said, I have no doubt of their action, because I sincerely believe that the people at home, whether in New York or California, the great overwhelming majority of the Democrats of this Nation and of the Republicans, too, are no longer in favor of monopoly or special privilege of any kind at the expense of the people of this Republic. I hold it as the part of political wisdom to repeal this law passed in 1912.

The President has been hectored more or less by various Members of Congress and called on to give reasons and to transmit to the Senate the evidence that other nations do not approve our violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The correspondence submitted to the Senate long before the President's message shows the attitude of Great Britain (S. Doc. 11, 63d Cong., 2d sess.). The only nation that had a direct treaty right to object has objected. About all that other representatives of other nations could do would be to diplomatically suggest that they did not understand the treaty as Congress appeared to have understood the treaty when it passed the toll-exemption provision.

The President in his short message to Congress gave all the reason that was necessary to justify our Government in repealing this provision, and when he suggested that he would be embarrassed in dealing with other nations on other matters affecting our foreign relations if we did not repeal this law, the intimation ought to be enough to a man who appreciates the importance of a great Nation like ours keeping its treaty obligations, both in letter and in spirit. If we break and refuse to keep both the letter and the spirit of the treaty provision, how shall the President of the United States know how to deal with other nations when he is no longer able to give them assurance that a treaty, when made, will be faithfully upheld? If the written promise of the United States is of no value to other nations, why should they negotiate with a Nation that does not keep faith?

Whatever any man may think of the political aspect of his conduct in this matter, I wish to put on the record that I have an abiding and an unalterable faith in the integrity, the honor, and the wise judgment of the people of the United States, and stand upon that firm foundation. I wish that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty shall be complied with, both in letter and in spirit, and I hope every Senator feels the same way. I can not believe that the exemption of tolls is justified either by the treaty or economic justice, and I am fully convinced that the people of my State and of the United States are overwhelmingly of this opinion.

Economic justice, the national honor, and political wisdom demand the repeal of this act.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire now to take up the Army appropriation bill again.

Provided, however, That for the purpose of this act officers heretofore transferred from other arms of the service or who for any reason have lost rank shall be considered as of the same length of service as the officers now immediately preceding them on the lineal list.

Provided further, That captains and first lieutenants of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry who have less commissioned service than first lieutenants and second lieutenants of the United States Infantry, respectively, are to remain at the foot of the lineal list of captains and first lieutenants until such time as their commissioned service shall equal the commissioned service of the last first lieutenant and second lieutenant of Infantry, promoted to captain and first lieutenant, respectively.

Provided further, That the status of all officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry recommissioned in accordance with the provisions of the preceding section shall be, in every respect, that of all other officers of Infantry of like grades, and that all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, and that nothing in these provisions shall be so construed as to increase the total number of officers now authorized by law.

And to insert:

Provided, That on and after the 30th day of June, 1914, the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry of the United States Army shall be organized, composed, and officered, and subject to the same laws and regulations as are other regiments of Infantry of the United States Army, and it shall be designated as the Thirty-first Regiment of Infantry, United States Army.

Officers who are captains or first lieutenants of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry on the 30th day of June, 1914, shall be recommissioned as captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants of Infantry of the United States Army in their respective grades, to take rank on the lineal list of officers of Infantry immediately after the junior officers of the same grade whose total commissioned service equals or exceeds theirs: Provided, That for the purpose of this act total commissioned service shall include commissioned service in the Regular Army, in the Volunteers, in the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry, and in the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, and that the commissioned service of those officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry who were officers of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry shall be counted as continuous and uninterrupted between the 20th day of June, 1908, and the 31st day of December, 1908.

Provided further, That those officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry recommissioned as captains and first lieutenants of Infantry whose total commissioned service is less than that of any officers of Infantry of the next lower grade shall not advance on the lineal list of captains and first lieutenants, respectively, of Infantry, nor on the relative list of officers of the United States Army, until such time as there no longer remains on the lineal list of officers of Infantry any officer of the next lower grade of equal or greater length of total commissioned service, and shall take rank in the grades of captain and first lieutenant, respectively, on the lineal list of officers of Infantry and on the relative list of officers of the United States Army immediately after the juniors in rank of such officers of Infantry of equal or greater total commissioned service.

Provided further, That for the purpose of this Act officers transferred from other arms or corps of the service or who have lost rank by reason of the sentence of court-martial or as the result of examination for promotion shall be considered as having the same total commissioned service as the officer immediately preceding them on the lineal list of officers of Infantry.

And provided further, That any officer now holding a commission in the Infantry who vacated a commission as an officer of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry by accepting an appointment as a second lieutenant of Infantry to fill a vacancy other than one created by the act of February 2, 1901, and who has not received credit for his service as a commissioned officer of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry for the purpose of determining his lineal and relative rank as an officer of Infantry shall be recommissioned as an officer of Infantry in his present grade with rank from such date as will place him, when the provisions of this act shall have been fully executed, in the lineal and relative position to which he would have been entitled upon full and complete execution of the provisions of this act had he remained in the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry and the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry and been recommissioned as an officer of Infantry pursuant to this act.

The necessary number of promotions of senior officers of Infantry of the next lower respective grades shall be made to provide field officers for the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry and captains and first lieutenants for the third battalion to be organized under the provisions of this act.

All laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act relating to the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside that I may move an executive session.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator from Indiana withhold that for a moment?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

TRADING IN COTTON.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] a question with relation to Senate bill 110, which was passed this afternoon. My attention has just been called to section 6. I should like to ask the Senator if that section does not legalize such a pool as the cotton pool under which Hayne, Brown, and Patten were indicted and which was sustained by the Supreme Court? Is not that the effect of section 6?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not prepared to answer the question. I did not understand that the case had been before the Supreme Court and have not examined it.

Mr. KENYON. It was. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed. I do not want to bring it up now, but I think that section was voted upon under a misapprehension. I will ask the Senate to take up the motion at some other time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be laid aside.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask if it will be the unfinished business to-morrow?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be the unfinished business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 22 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 28, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for the spirit come into the world which teaches us that he who best serves his fellow men best serves his God, and which in the last analysis places the emphasis upon those God-like qualities which mark the manly man and in times of great crises make him a hero. Give us plenteously of that spirit, that at the close of our earthly career we may be assured we have wrought with God. And Thine be the praise. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BRUMBAUGH, until March 30, on account of important business.

To Mr. LINTHICUM, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SMITH of New York, for three days, on account of death in family.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the pending resolution in respect to Panama Canal tolls, and ask how much time has been consumed on each side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has 30 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has 14 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] 10 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask gentlemen on that side to consume some of their time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from Texas has 30 minutes remaining to 24 on this side.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that the overwhelming demand for time compels me to yield but one minute to a man to whom I would like to yield one hour, a man on the other side of the House, a man who risked his life for the honor of this country. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire the privilege of introducing one amendment, and that is for the dismantling of the forts and fortifications of the Panama Canal, to neutralize the Panama Canal, and make it a free waterway, in accordance with the spirit of the age of The Hague conference and of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I heard the debate on the fortification of the Panama Canal in February, 1911, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who was in charge of the bill, on page 3485 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD said that this was a part of the coast-line defense, that it belongs to America, to do with as we saw fit. [Applause.] Now I believe it is held that this is a great eleemosynary institution, for the benefit of the nations of the Old World. If I am allowed to offer that amendment, I would be very glad to vote for the previous question; otherwise I shall vote against the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself a moment or two to this amendment. I tried for two weeks to get an agreement to consider this bill, as our committee has always been able to do in this House. There were so many different angles and ideas and interests represented that I found it impossible, and submitted the first rule that has been submitted from our committee since my connection with it 17 years ago. I conferred with the Committee on Rules, and with the distinguished Speaker, and with the other side. We started out with a proposition for 10 hours' debate, which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and I understood the Speaker thought sufficient. Afterwards the other side wanted 15 hours. We agreed to that, and we understood the Speaker in conversation to think that was sufficient. [Applause.] I was willing to go further and allow any amount of debate, because after the special interests have filled the country, the press, and every avenue with a lobby for this special interest for nine years we are willing that the people shall have their innings. We are not afraid of debate. We are willing that the truth shall be laid before this House, and when it is done the people will win. [Applause.]

We do not want to permit amendments on this bill, because none are needed. The friends of this bill have not suggested any amendments. The distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] had a theoretical objection to a rule, because on tariff bills there ought to be permission for amendment, but he did not suggest that he would offer or vote for any, and said that he would vote for the bill, anyhow. The distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who has such a fine voice and such a beautiful, dramatic delivery, was terribly against the rule, and my other distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], the head of the distinguished party of solidarity in the House, the party which admits that it knows everything and is perfectly honest and enjoys perfectibility on earth—he objected to the rule because he was against it, anyhow, whether he amended it or not, and therefore he wanted an amendment. [Applause.]

It appears to me the right of amendment is absolutely immaterial. We made a horrible mistake two years ago, not against the other nations of the world primarily but against the 100,000,000 of people of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You agreed on the only thing upon which you ever turned our committee down in this House, to amend the bill in the one important point that protected your Treasury and gave the Government a chance to make revenues to operate that canal. We told you it would result in trouble with foreign nations, because we knew what a chance it would give the yellow journals and jingo orators to spout—that has been going on for years—and by a minority of Democrats and a majority of Republicans they turned our committee down. We had no idea of stopping. We did not intend to leave that mistake uncorrected. If there had never been a treaty, we would have tried to protect the interests of the American people. "Truth crushed to earth will rise again," and this will never be settled until it is settled right. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And if a coalition of a minority of Democrats with an unexpected union of the hitherto discordant elements of the Republican Party should succeed in defeating the Democratic majority and the Democratic administration again it will still be unsettled, and only mean another long combat and another long contest until it is settled right. [Applause on the Democratic side.] One mistake was the exempting of the coastwise vessels from tolls. The other was leaving the discretion in the hands of the President to reduce tolls on all American ships. That is as perfect a ship subsidy bill as the capacity of the canal can furnish, and everyone ought to be satisfied with that who wants to get his hand in the Treasury if the canal were large enough, but they confess to us that would not satisfy them. They confess to us they want to build up the merchant marine. We have the best coastwise trade on earth. They confess to us it was simply a starter, that they take what we give and will go on and get more and more in the future. Oh, there is no use for amendment on this bill. They want to offer something else.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] has just shown you the character of stuff they would go into if they could get an amendment on this bill. That is absolutely unconnected with the proposition and not in issue at all. How many wild things and theories would they bring up? They might not be germane, might go out on the point of order, but this proposition is simply, yes or no. It can be answered categorically. Do you believe in a ship subsidy or do you not? And we would believe in repealing it if there never had been a treaty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, they say it is a matter like the old Cannon laws. They do not mean that; that is a delusion, a great delusion. I suppose that is the reason there is so much applause on the Republican side of the House that we are going to put in something that they denounce as being like the Cannon laws. I do not know what else they would applaud on except that. At any rate we caught their old idea of rules when our present administration came in; and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] can give you a list of those things. Afterwards we substituted the caucus for that, and if that side has not villified the caucus more than it villified the rule presented here yesterday you may shoot me. Of course when the leader of the majority brought in a tariff bill, after considering it in caucus and its being thrashed out three or four weeks and all were bound together, they could say, "Shoot in your amendments, fire away, you can not faze us; we are safe." We did not want to call in any caucus here. We had never made this a partisan matter. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has always been nonpartisan.

To commit error is human, and fortunate it is for men and nations if they possess intelligence to discover and honesty and courage to correct errors before they suffer disastrous consequences. We committed a fearful blunder in the last Congress. It is necessary to correct it, it will continue to be necessary, and the necessity will grow more urgent and the consequences more disastrous the longer we delay. We made the mistake of providing for the exemption of ships in the coastwise trade, and we also invested the President with discretion to discriminate in favor of "vessels of the United States and its citizens," which would permit the President to exempt any ship registered or licensed in the foreign or domestic trade of the United States. I presume few will deny that this discretion, or the exercise thereof, might violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, though it seems that some people still deny that exemption of coastwise vessels constitutes a violation. We also made the mistake of providing that the minimum tolls for ships of commerce by net registered measurement should be the proportionate part of the cost of operating the canal, while for other forms of measurement the minimum should be the equivalent of 75 cents per net registered ton. This variance would permit a discrimination. The amendment proposed in section 2 would correct the last two evils. The first section of the bill would correct the first error.

In common with the majority of our committee, I have always urged uniform tolls at the canal, because the Government, as the constructor and owner, needs the tolls to defray the expense of operating the canal, and the people, when they find it out, will object to making a deficit and then paying money out of the Treasury to deadhead through the canal less than 10 per cent of that 10 per cent of the coastwise ships which can do business through the Panama Canal. We also recognize our solemn contracts in the treaty that we would not discriminate in behalf of any favorites.

One great hindrance to concord in this matter is the proneness to approach its consideration with the assumption that the treaty and conditions are, or ought to be, what we want them to be, and hence are unable to take up the unprejudiced study of the question. Often, having assumed unsound premises, we reason away to illogical and unjust conclusions, or rather we are disposed to stand pat and stubbornly contend for what we think the facts ought to be, with too little regard or knowledge for what they really are.

In the infancy of our Government we wisely advocated a free and open sea, because then as now we had a great deal more to gain than to lose by universal intercourse and freedom of commerce, and most nations have concurred in our policy in that regard. As to local and international waterways different circumstances may govern. Local waterways are usually by statute opened gratuitously to all comers. A distinction has sometimes been made, as in the case of Bolivia, between domestic waterways, on the improvement of which great expenditures have been made, and those available by nature. In addition to statutes reciprocal treaties have been made among most maritime nations permitting unrestricted entry and use of domestic waterways, but trade by vessels in such waterways is regulated by local laws. International waterways are always governed by treaty, though statutes may prescribe conduct and details. The most signal instance of artificial canals, which are not only universally used but exempt from tolls, are the canals on our Canadian border, some constructed by us and some by Canada. There are also natural waterways between us and Canada, all of which have a natural connection with the ocean through the St. Lawrence River. All of these are not only devoted to the free and equal use of the public, but this use is free of tolls, and made so by treaty. They are infinitely more important to us in the way of commerce than both the Panama and Suez Canals can ever be, and they must be kept open to the ocean not only by treaty but by the scrupulous observance of treaties, and it would be no excuse for violation of such a treaty to say that England is on the other side, and we do not love England, or that the President desires the treaty to be observed because observance of treaties is necessary to the maintenance of a successful foreign policy. The distinction, however, must be borne in mind as to the different uses and meanings of the word "free." A "free port" or a "free canal" does not mean exemption from tolls or charges; it means admission to the benefit of facilities on equal terms with all others, whatever those terms may be. Before we acquired dominion on both sides of the Mississippi River and demonstrated that its source is in the United States its navigation was open to universal use by treaty.

The Panama Canal is the most expensive undertaking of the kind known to man. No country on the Isthmus was able to build it after the Spanish yoke was thrown off, nor prior thereto would the monarchs of Europe allow one another to build it, if one of them had been able or so disposed. Soon after the independence of those Republics negotiations began between Nicaragua and the United States, and inasmuch as England and some other European countries were still very active in that direction, there was long discussion as to whether or not it should or could be built and how and by whom, but our Government, from whatever motives, originated the doctrine as to Isthmian transit that it should be open on equal terms, however constructed, to all mankind. If we could have found a route across our own territory, we could have proceeded without consulting anybody else. We might have subjugated the Isthmian people and asserted dominion over the Isthmus in defiance of the balance of the world, but in that elder day we cherished some principles and traditions at variance with the policy of aggression and violence. In fact, we were advocating the doctrine of independent Republics in Central and South America, and all we wished to avoid in that line was European aggression in that quarter. Agitation and negotiation resulted in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in which it was provided that private capital, or rather commerce, should build the canal. The United States scored its point in that treaty. We did not feel able nor willing to build the canal at that time, if England had consented, and England and certain other nations were unwilling for us to build it, and we were happy to secure the concession that England would not try to control it nor by reason of it secure any ascendency or influence on the Isthmus, and we were perfectly willing to make the same agreement as to ourselves, which we did, but even with the backing of both England and the United States, commerce was too selfish and cowardly to put up the money and build the canal. It did build the Panama Railroad and until the United States acquired it, operated it under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. In the meantime private capital, under the auspices of European Governments, built the Suez Canal and largely reduced the universal necessity for connection between the different oceans. The Suez Canal being built, under universal consent, by private capital, was required, under the general guaranty of protection, to treat all countries alike, just as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty required should be done in case of any canal or railroad built by virtue of its terms, which have been scrupulously carried out through the whole history of the Panama Railroad Co. without any claims for exception other than from the country traversed by it, which contracted for and was allowed concessions such as we have now contracted to allow Panama for the use of the canal.

When it was found that commerce would not build the Isthmian Canal, and the people of this country decided that this Government ought to build it, we found several difficulties in the way. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty would not permit our Government to construct it and control it; second, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty forbade the fortification of the canal; and third, and most odious, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided that we must share the protection of that canal with the nations of the world. That was the humiliating feature of the treaty. That was what we jingoed against in the Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses. England would have readily consented for us to build the canal, I have no doubt, and did finally consent to modify and supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by abrogating the provision against fortification by placing upon the United States Government the entire responsibility for protecting the canal and maintaining its neutrality and equality and permitting the United States Government, at its own expense, to construct the canal, and enjoy the income therefrom, retaining only one of the old provisions, the same one which would have obtained in case the canal had been constructed by commerce—exact equality of treatment at the canal for the ships, citizens, and subjects of all nations. Having been first to inaugurate the doctrine, having always cherished it as a sheet anchor of our commercial salvation and prosperity, we were glad to retain the provision in consideration of ridding ourselves of the binding fetters of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

An effort has been made at this late date to becloud the issue and divert or pervert the meaning of certain language in the treaty by attempting to show the intent and understanding of the Members in the Senate at the time of its adoption. So far as the Bard amendment is concerned, attempting, as a substitute for article 3 of the first draft of the treaty, to reserve "the right to exempt coastwise ships," the article had already been stricken out on the motion of Senator Foraker, and it is hard to understand the illusion or confusion of the Senators in voting so seriously on a proposition when all of them on both sides understood that it was unnecessary. It is still harder to understand when we remember the report of Senator Davis bringing in that treaty, and the note of Secretary Hay, both of which fully explained its provisions substantially as I have just stated them.

I presume that gentlemen will have to submit to the inviolable rule as to records, both legislative and judicial—no record can be impeached in that way, and therefore it will have to stand that the United States Senate, with full notice of what the issue was, refused to reserve the right to exempt coastwise ships from tolls, but there is a more important point in the history. Gentlemen holding the opposite theory have not even attempted to avoid or evade it, and yet it absolutely forecloses the question. The provision for equal treatment is brought forward from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, of section 8 thereof, and vitalized and retained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in two clauses, one in the preamble, as follows: "Without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." The other is in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as follows: "Substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople for the free navigation of the Suez Canal." Senator Bacon, of Georgia, recognized that the first clause kept alive article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and sought to fix the treaty like advocates of exemption now think it ought to be, and consequently claim that it is. So he moved to strike out the words "without impairing the general principle," and so forth, but it was defeated on roll call by a vote of 60 to 18—more than 3 to 1. The other language in article 3 which specifically applies the rules of the Suez Canal Senator McLaurin, of Mississippi, desired to rid us of, so as to fix the treaty like some gentlemen advocating exemption now think it ought to be, and therefore claim that it is, moved to strike the words "substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople for the free navigation of the Suez Canal," and that was voted down by such an overwhelming majority that no roll call was obtained, and, strange to say, not only did such veterans as Morgan, LODGE, McEnery, and Pettus vote against the motion of Senator Bacon, but even Senator Bard voted against it and immediately afterwards voted to consent to the treaty with all those qualifications in it, including other language going right to the crux of the case as well as those already mentioned. For instance, the world is full of noise about the United States Government having to pay toll on its battleships.

The proposition is nonsensical; it looks foolish either to affirm or deny it—it amounts to nothing. The canal, the battleships, and the tolls all belong to the United States, and under any theory of the case the most that we ever could be required to do would be to keep a census of the use of the canal by the Government ships, which we would do anyhow as to every kind of business, official or private, and the Government knows now just exactly what the tonnage is that passes through the Soo Canal every year, although it charges nothing for it. There is no trouble about that, but the point is, by article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, our Government is permitted to construct the canal in any way it chooses and have and enjoy all rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right to provide for the regulation and management of the canal. If an owner and constructor can not, as an incident to such, pass his own property through it, it would be difficult to determine what rights would be incident to ownership and construction. If that was the only language in the permit, there would be no limit; we could do absolutely what we pleased to anybody and for anybody and against anybody or anything; but in order to preserve the consistency of the policy and equality of treatment a qualifying clause was inserted in that article, to wit, "subject to the provisions of the present treaty," which meant, "without impairing article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and conforming to the rules substantially as embodied for the free navigation of the Suez Canal." So, Senator Bacon, foreseeing what gentlemen now would want, moved to strike out that qualifying clause. If he had succeeded, the provisions and reservations as to equality and fair treatment might have been construed to have less force. He understood that that treaty would have to be construed by what it said and not by what gentlemen 14 years afterwards thought it ought to be; therefore he moved to strike out the words "subject to the provisions of the present treaty," and by a vote of 60 negatives to 18 affirmatives the proposition was defeated.

The scare heads about battleships having to pay tolls was gotten up not to express the truth, but, like many other contentions of the same special interest, was designed to delude the public mind and misrepresent the facts. The sentence to be amended reads in part as follows:

> When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens.

We propose to amend that sentence by striking out the words—

> Other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens.

It is obvious that in both forms it deals with ships of commerce, and no others. The term "vessels of the United States" is a technical designation in our navigation laws for the ships engaged in our carrying trade, domestic and foreign. There is no warrant nor foundation for the assertion that battleships were involved at all. The official ships belonging to the Government of the United States are not mentioned in the Panama Canal act, nor should they be. The toll provision of section 5 deals with vessels which should pay tolls and has nothing to do with official vessels of the Government, which, as the owner of the vessels, tolls, and canal, would stultify itself to consider the question of paying tolls to itself.

It is said the word "neutralization" in the preamble does not mean "equality." I may not be versed in the lexicography of discrimination or special privilege, but I have been taught to believe that things which are equal to the same things are equal to each other, and that a word generally means the same thing wherever it is used, especially when used in connection with the same subject. If the word "neutralization" in the preamble does not mean "equality," there is no use to cavil any longer about rules of the Suez Canal adopted in article 3, because the same word "neutralization" is used, and article 3 begins by declaring—and then proceeds to enumerate substantially the Suez rules. So, another sophistry has to fall.

The United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules—

Attention has already been called to the fact that we have made many treaties with Central American countries touching isthmian transit. There are nine American countries which touch on both oceans and either have or could have coastwise trade so as to be situated just like us and feel the same necessity for using the canal for the coastwise trade; yet not one of those treaties have distinguished between the coastwise vessels and foreign vessels, one obvious reason being that they all might want to operate coastwise trade, and that all those numerous treaties, as well as the treaties for border waterways, provide for exact equality. Examination of all our treaties with foreign countries will show that wherever a distinction is to be observed between coastwise and foreign trade it is so expressly stated in the treaty. So by express language by the record in the Senate by the construction of all our treaties with all countries, and especially with the isthmian countries, it is clear that no discrimination was to be made as to the coastwise trade, and that equality was to be preserved as to all vessels, ships, and subjects. There is another scarecrow set up by the advocates of exemption, and that is that our plain reading of the treaty would invalidate the contract with Panama to pass her official ships through. Panama certainly owned the Canal Zone, and we recognized it by treaty with her. She certainly had a right to build the canal if she had had the money without consulting any other country. Not being able to build it herself, she had a right to contract with us to build it for her; and she had a right to reserve an interest in it, and that interest partly was passage of her official ships for all time. Compared with the other payments and incidents attending the transaction, it will be conceded that she has already handsomely paid for all of her use of the canal from now to eternity, and it is folly to assume that any other foreign country will object when the explanation is made. The reference made in the British note is not a complaint at all and is susceptible of clear explanation just as in case of the Panama Railroad, which for more than half a century has complied with a similar contract made first with New Granada, renewed with Colombia, and afterwards with Panama and scrupulously complied with. In other words, a part of the pay for the concession, expressed by a reservation in conveying the title, is the right of preferential consideration as to control of official business through the canal or railroad.

The railroad bugaboo is the main stock in trade, but you were not told by the other side that most of the valuable ships in the coastwise trade are owned by the railroads or in alliance with the railroads, and the evidence is that one company accused of being in alliance with the railroads, but denying it, keeps a grapevine telegraph communicating with the directors' offices of all the railroads and fixes the steamship rates just a little lower every time the railroads file a tariff. The evidence is not only of that line, but of other lines also capable of competing, that they will not compete at all—that line has enough ships to do all the coastwise business that will ever be done through the canal and that it always will do it in defiance of all companies and that the others will not compete with it. That company, the American Hawaiian Co., has been transshipping over the Tehauntepec Railroad; it pays to that railroad one-third of its entire freight rate; it loses two weeks' time loading and unloading ships on the opposite sides of the Isthmus. One-third of the freight rate is 33⅓ per cent; two weeks' loss of time for the ships to load and unload is 25 per cent, which makes 58⅓ per cent, and they have to pay stokers and laborers for their work of transshipping, which would certainly be 8⅓ per cent, making 66⅔ per cent. When they can sail ships through the canal without loss of time and without the expense of loading and unloading or dividing with the Tehauntepec Railroad they will save 66⅔ per cent out of which to pay tolls at the canal. That company can pop its heels and jump up and defy not only all railroads, but all steamship companies for the business through the canal, and it can haul freight for the amount of the tolls plus 33⅓ per cent, their present charges. No railroad on earth would handle goods 500, much less 3,000, miles for that rate. The railroads never expected to compete on their own tracks with the canal. The railroads expected to get the free tolls and then run ships parallel with their own lines, drive off competition, and raise the rates to their own level.

If the advocates of exemption had been allowed to write the provision, they would have made that provision conflict with the treaty; but we wrote that correctly, and compelled the railroads, through the operation of the interstate-commerce law, to divorce their ships from their own control. Not only that, but we provided that railroads running into the interior should exchange freight at the wharf with other ship lines instead of those with which they might be in combination, thus not only driving railroad ships out of the canal, but out of all the coastwise water, infinitely more important, and giving all the interior of the country some benefit of navigation through the canal and elsewhere, because the commission is also by that provision required to regulate the portion of the rate taken by the railroad in the interior.

A fair sample of the good faith of the advocates of the special interests is found in a report of a certain standing committee in another legislative body, which is unmentionable in this place. Among the members of the committee are some eminent statesmen keenly sensitive and fully alive to the advantage of the special interests. The sham fight of the exemption advocates on the railroads was professedly to prevent a certain transcontinental railroad from monopolizing the canal traffic through a ship company which it controlled. The divorce provided for in the eleventh section of the House bill was butchered up by the aforesaid committee, which prepared and reported a scheme annulling that divorce and in lieu thereof providing for the very arrangement desired by the combination of the existing said railroad company and its allied steamship company. The plan and report would revolutionize our navigation laws by mongrelizing the two branches of our marine commerce and avoiding the force of section 11 of our canal act by permitting that railroad company and its ship company not only to monopolize the coastwise business through the canal, but also all of the foreign business between the Pacific coast and Europe and between the Atlantic coast and the Far East. That seems to be about all there is of the world, and as this Government did not build the canal for the sole benefit of the Southern Pacific and the Pacific Mail, the conference committee set that scheme at naught.

The public press has recently contained statements that certain coast cities and organizations which have inveighed against railroads as a pretext for promoting the exemption of tolls are now pleading for a postponement of the separation of railroads from their ships. Some of the authors of that extraordinary scheme of consolidating and monopolizing both coastwise and foreign shipping in the interest of that particular combination have been swift and turbulent in recent denunciation of the President for his appeal to Congress to support his foreign policy and in trying to deceive the American people by unfounded charges about the connection of the railroads with this subject. No amount of bombast nor acrimony nor false charges can blot out the facts of the record that, on the recommendation of our committee, Congress by the eleventh section of the canal act removed transcontinental railroads from all possibility of competition with water transportation through the canal, and ought to remove it from further discussion by candid men. Sooner or later the people will find it out.

We are sorry we are unable to console gentlemen about the Canadian railroads. I am unable to understand how we can control them any more than we can the Tehuantepec Railroad or a railroad across South America or any other railroad out of our jurisdiction. We would like to have all the tolls we can get at the canal, and we do not care if all the railroads in Canada, Europe, Asia, Africa, and the islands of the seas build ships, run them through the canal, and pay tolls. What we want to do is to keep the railroads operating under our control in the exercise of their legitimate functions—running trains on their tracks and exchanging honestly and fairly at the coast line with all ships that may do business on the water. We are unable to violate the treaty by saying to Canada that her ships shall not use the canal if she conforms to the rules regulating the canal. If any of her railroads engage in business subject to the interstate-commerce laws of the United States, such railroads can not operate ships in competition with that part of the business in which that railroad is engaged. The best illustration presented to us was put up by a very patriotic citizen—and all those advocates of special interests are both patriotic and pious; they would not support anything that is mean or selfish; it is broad, noble, high-minded philanthropy for the public service. They admit it themselves. This gentleman told a doleful tale about how having to pay tolls at the canal would compel the American coastwise ships to pile freight rates mountain high and prevent the Pacific coast lumber from competing in the New York markets with Georgia and Maine pine.

When his attention was directed to the fact that Georgia and Maine pine was entitled to as much consideration as Oregon and Washington lumber, he then claimed that if coastwise ships had to pay tolls Canadians could take lumber from a Vancouver sawmill and take it around to the Atlantic coast and deliver it as cheap as he could from his sawmills. We detected his fear that that would aid us in breaking the grip of the Lumber Trust to some extent. Putting lumber on the free list would enable New York and Boston and Philadelphia to get lumber from Vancouver, not only in competition with Washington and Oregon lumber, but also in competition with Georgia and Maine lumber; it might loosen the grasp of the Lumber Trust and enable them to get lumber so cheap that it would benefit people more than any possible benefit, actual or theoretical, that could ever visit those cities from the exemption of tolls. On cross-examination the patriotic gentleman disclosed that the lumbering interests in which he was engaged had a large fleet of coastwise ships, and of course that only strengthened our assurance of his patriotic and high-minded motives; but an exact example was presented, not only showing how that would benefit our border cities, but also how Canadian border cities might be injured by discrimination. As to intercourse between Portland, Boston, or New York, on the Atlantic, and Seattle or other Pacific ports, on one hand, and intercourse between the neighboring Canadian cities on the Atlantic coast and the Canadian cities near the border on the Pacific coast, on the other hand, both connections would prove profitable in the same way. It is only rational to assume such a situation was had in mind in negotiating for equal treatment of commerce and conditions. It is easy to understand that if a connection between the Atlantic Canadian cities and Pacific Canadian cities must pay tolls it would be a discrimination in conditions of commerce to exempt from tolls, whatever they might be, our vessels between our coast cities. Although very small, as we contend, yet it would violate the letter of the treaty.

The most unfair and far-fetched arguments advanced by the advocates of exemption are the two based, respectively, on the Supreme Court construction of a part of the treaty of 1815 and on the alleged treatment of the provisions of that treaty by Great Britain. They argue that exemption of coastwise ships at Panama, an international waterway at which equal charges and conditions of traffic are guaranteed by treaty, notwithstanding acquisition of dominion after the treaty is sustained by the case of Olsen against Smith, which held that exemption from pilotage dues of a coastwise ship in a local American port was not a violation of the treaty of 1815. The decision was manifestly right in the light of the terms of that treaty, which plainly specified that it related to foreign commerce between the British territory in Europe and the territory of the United States, which was limited to 13 Atlantic States. Furthermore, the guaranty of reciprocal equal treatment in the ports of the two countries was accompanied by a provision in the treaty "subject to the laws of the countries, respectively." Furthermore, the treaty expressly excluded from its terms all transactions between the United States, Canada, and the West Indies, but expressly left them subject to their own local regulations, and other language in the treaty expressly indicates that its terms were not to apply to the coastwise trade at all. In fact, the whole treaty, taken together, deals entirely with foreign trade. While the charge that the British Government violated that treaty by preference to its own coastwise trade might or might not justify our retaliatory violation, the terms of the treaty do not seem to have been violated by Great Britain at all. If ever she did favor her own coastwise trade, she doubtless did just what the Supreme Court said in construing the language of the treaty, and rightly held that the treaty did not deal with coastwise trade at all. So two other false arguments go by the board, and they have been the most potential agents for evil of all the misleading contentions put forward in the cause of the special interests. There being such essential and absolute difference in every respect between the two situations, the case of Olsen against Smith can have no bearing on the question at Panama; neither can the alleged action of the British arouse resentment or retaliation when the British have construed the treaty exactly as our Supreme Court did, as not applying to coastwise trade.

Limited time is too precious to attempt to answer in detail all of the fallacies and sophistries advanced in the interest of exemption. The bugaboos most violently talked about now in opposition to honest equality among our own people and with foreign nations are three: The first, that England is the other party to the treaty; second, that we now have a President who agrees with our committee and a majority of the Democrats in this House, as well as numbers of the best Republicans, and also the best Bull Moosers until they received orders from their leader to fight the administration; the third is that the Democratic platform at Baltimore altered the historical and traditional policy of the Democratic Party against special privilege and subsidies, and launched it forth as the champion and promoter of the classes against the masses, and that the friends of privilege are bound to support that sentence in the Democratic platform.

As to the first, we can no more prevent England from having an interest in the matter than a child can prevent its relationship with its parents. England arrived first, and brought us here. I do not propose to proclaim the bastardy of the American people by denying our legitimacy or defaming our ancestor. She tried to whip us twice, but gave up the job; and we were glad when she desisted. We made a mistake when she quit the first time in not requiring her to give up Canada and all of her West Indian possessions. That would have eliminated her from consideration in our policy; but George Washington was tired, and the heroes of Valley Forge were willing to be let alone. If Senator CHAMBERLAIN, or Mr. AINEY, of Pennsylvania, or Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, or Mr. KAHN, of California, had been present, I have no doubt a brighter star would have illumed the sky of military glory, and England would have relinquished all pretensions in the western world; but events happen too quickly; they could not wait for the birth of those great fighters.

Again in 1814 our people were so glad when she quit that they committed the same fatal blunder of failing to require her to relinquish her interests on this hemisphere. The third and greatest mistake was when we gave up "54–40" and failed to shut England out from the Pacific Ocean. If we had held to that line her possessions would have touched only one ocean in this part of the world and her coastwise trade could not now be interested pari pasu with ours in the Panama Canal, and she would not have had to contend that connection between Atlantic and Pacific Canadian cities was just as important to her as connection between our Atlantic and Pacific cities is to us; but, woe be it said, these great men were born too late. If the several belligerent statesmen already mentioned had only been born a half a century earlier they would have been spared the task of supporting the interests and demands of the Ship Trust against the people and Government of the United States, even to the extent of vilifying the best President since Jefferson, discrediting the best administration the country has known since the era of good will under Madison and Monroe, and imperiling the peaceful relations of the country with the balance of the world; what a pity they were born so late.

I have not always loved England myself. I have some Irish instinct in me, and I never have forgiven England for allowing Lord Castlereagh to debauch Ireland and rob her of her independence. I think it ought to be restored now, but I would have felt just the same about it if any other country had been treated that way instead of Ireland. I hate her just as ardently for overrunning and slaughtering the Boers two or three times just for the theoretical name of suzerainty. I have lain awake at night and shed tears because she was able to divert the attention of Napoleon and compel him to march away from Boulogne instead of invading England and changing the course of civilization; but when I read the foolish and false utterances of statesmen of this day about England I conclude that maybe I was ignorant and foolish at that time. If any of these gentlemen hate England now worse than I do they have a good opportunity to show their valor instead of staying here fighting our Government for the sake of one financial trust that backs the ships and railroads alike in this country to mulct the people; they ought to go on over to Ireland and help Ulster to whip England; they have a good chance, without hurting or robbing anybody at home.

When England undertook to gobble up Venezuela she enjoyed the benefit of my wrath at that time. But we were right at that time, and she proceeded to acquiesce. When we were bound by the humiliating provision in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that we had to unite with the balance of the nations of the world in maintaining the neutrality and equality of the Isthmian Canal, I was a bitter jingo and denounced England, and the real American spirit was with me at that time and prevailed in demanding such modification of that treaty or denunciation of it as would enable our Government to build the canal and maintain its equality and neutrality by its own strong right arm. That is all we wanted, accompanied by the right to fortify and defend it, which was also conceded. The only thing that England insisted on retaining was our own proposition, insisted on by us for 80 years, "absolute equality"; and certainly the Government, as a corporation constructing a canal, had a right to make it a successful enterprise, and to that end to collect toll from all the commerce that use it, just as a private corporation would have done had one built it, as the Suez Canal was built. The inability of the advocates of exemption to distinguish between the Government of the United States and either a part or the whole of the people of the United States or the commerce of the United States is a misfortune which I can not help or cure. They have made up their minds to consider all three as one, that the Government of the United States is the people of the United States, and the people of the United States is the Ship Trust, and they have no mind for reason on the subject. The people will have to furnish the understanding, and doubtless will visit condign punishment upon the willfully stupid.

The pretended haters of England who make the pretense for this case alone try to make much of the fact that England will be a large beneficiary from the canal, and that we are building it for her benefit. The commonest intelligence can understand that the authority which collects the tolls and, in addition thereto, uses the canal for its own official ships will be the largest beneficiary if there is any patronage at all.

If the United States Government gives away one-half of the income, of course it will lose to that extent. The people of the United States on the two coasts, which are connected by that canal, will be the greatest beneficiaries through the improved instrumentality of commerce. The universal benefit of the canal is the cutting off of a good many thousands of miles of distance, and it cuts it off for our ships and for the commerce of our people just as much as for foreign ships. The thing that the Ship Trust will have to learn is that cutting that distance off constitutes the great benefit to commerce of the canal, and that there shall be no special benefit to anybody. We hope that England, with her large commerce and many battleships, will be, next to our own people, the largest customer of the canal, but we can not expect her to do so if we discriminate against her. She would not be kin to us if she submitted to it. She is already our largest customer, and we hope to feed and clothe her teeming millions for generations to come. True, she is benefited by finding clothes and food in our country, but our people are benefited by selling them to her and getting the price. If she also becomes the largest customer of the canal and pays in her tolls, it will be a glorious thing for us.

If we are to be allowed to disregard a treaty, just because England is on the other side, on a subject that has been in negotiation between us for 90 years and about a provision that we put in ourselves and have always insisted on, it will be a strange proposition in moral and business ethics, to say nothing of statecraft. The truth is, that treaty is in the condition now of a partially performed contract. England has done all she agreed to do; she has permitted us to build the canal, which we had no right to do in a foreign country except by the treaty; she has permitted us to make rules and regulations for its management and provide for taking all the revenues from its operation. Now we deny the only stipulation which remains in the contract for her benefit, to wit, that the canal shall not be the instrument of discrimination, but an instrumentality for ships of the world to pass across the Isthmus instead of going 8,000 miles around Cape Horn; that that instrumentality of transit should charge everybody alike and treat everybody alike.

When we refuse to comply, we stand in the position of a man who bought property on a credit and took possession and used it, and then said, "I am in possession; it is mine; and I will do as I please with it, and the vendor can go to hades." We are just about as honorable and respectable in the position taken by the exemptors as that dishonorable debtor. If the fact that the other party to the contract demands compliance when the debt is due constitutes a casus belli, I would like to invoke the principle as well as the warriors to whip the bankers whom I owe when they dun me on my debts.

There is more claptrap, poppycock, and delusion about this jingoism against England than any other feature of the Ship-Trust propaganda, which is fraudulent from beginning to end and has filled the country with misrepresentations ever since the canal was started. I am told that in Tammany Hall and some districts in New Orleans and San Francisco people are infuriated on the idea that the President is trying to open the canal free to all English ships and prohibit our own Government ships and American vessels of commerce from using the canal at all. That is as reasonable and honest as any of their arguments and contains as much truth. The jingo situation has been artfully and purposely planned by the advocates of exemption. When we plead with them two years ago not to shackle the great canal enterprise with this graft to special interests, but to wait and give the Government a chance to see if the canal would be self-supporting and pay the expense of operation and then determine whether we had anything to give away or not or devise other means to help the merchant marine, they frankly said they knew it would not be self-supporting; that they wanted to make the exemption then because it never could be made afterwards; and that they did not care if it made a deficit of $10,000,000, they wanted to get the exemption while they could. They knew as well as we did that it was a violation of the treaty, and if trouble with foreign nations had to come it could be talked about and the subject could be beclouded by the jingo press thundering forth denunciations against England, inflame the public mind, and thereby prevent repeal. We think that scheme will fail.

The second trouble is that a sentence was put into a plank in the Democratic platform. Of course that is used by the Republican floor leader and by the Bull Moose floor leader, not as a reason for their opposition, but as an instrument to try to stir up dissensions on this side of the House and to indulge in criticism of the administration. It is fortunate that that is a knife that will cut both ways. There are honest Republicans and Bull Moosers whose votes will not be influenced by that, and there may be some Democrats who will see the point and flee from the error of their ways before it is too late. Of course there are some Democrats who want an excuse for voting for the exemption. I will try to show that that is a very poor excuse, and if that is the best they have they would better stick to the people and let the special interests take care of themselves. They are always able to do it; they always have a man everywhere at the right time to look after their interest, even on Democratic platform committees, and, unlike the butler who forgot "Joseph, when released from prison and restored to high favor with the King," these friends of the special interests never forget their friends on any occasion. A negro servant, rebuked for stealing a dishrag, said, "Master, I had a chance and I wanted to keep my hand in." It is true that on the idea that Members and Senators present would aid the committee on platform by writing expressions approving the acts of a Democratic House, one of the leading friends of exemption wrote in a sentence favoring the exemption of coastwise ships from toll. It was true that that was passed in the House which had a Democratic majority, but it was only half the truth; a good majority of the Democrats had voted against the exemption, and if that had been known the sentence would never have slipped into that plank. If you do not believe it, go ask the chairman of that committee on platform and see if he will deny it. He was busy watching Tammany Hall and Wall Street for the protection of the people, but it seems like he watched the wrong man. The Savior predicted false prophets, who could deceive the very elect. That sentence is in a plank, and if any of the jingo press had wanted to tell the truth they would have published the plank instead of that garbled extract. The plank treats of merchant marine and announces the time-honored doctrine of the Democratic Party in favor of building up a marine by constitutional methods, and expressly denounces anything that would place burdens on the people or take money from the Treasury.

The order of President Taft, as set forth by Secretary Knox, fixing canal tolls, expressly makes the exemption a burden on the people and a charge on the Treasury. He decided how much revenue he wanted, considered that as equally distributed among all shipping, then deducted the part remitted to the coastwise ships and required foreign ships to pay only the amount that they would have paid without that remission, and, as stated by Secretary Knox, that remission clearly makes a deficit in the Treasury and requires taxation on the people and a burden on the people to pay it into and out of the Treasury, and is a plain subsidy. The exemption sentence is in direct contradiction to the main plank into which it is interjected—both can not stand. Which shall stand, the cardinal doctrine or the innovation? A New York Senator, friendly to the Ship Trust, had printed as a Senate document a speech by one of the other friends of the ship subsidy, in which it was declared that that sentence in that plank marked a departure of the Democratic Party from its traditional opposition to subsidies. If that sentence falls, the old doctrine of common honesty and equal rights so long advocated by the Democratic Party will stand. If that sentence stands, the old doctrine has to fall, and henceforth the Democratic Party stands as the apologist and champion of special privilege and subsidy. Furthermore, those delegates were not sent to that convention to pass on the question of canal tolls, and that sentence was obiter dictum in law, and in corporation practice it would be ultra vires. It was something that that convention had no business fooling with, and the Democrats of the country had no idea that a Tammany brave would be allowed to go there and sow tares in their wheat patch. That plank in the platform declares for constitutional methods. The Constitution declares that a treaty is one of the supreme laws of the land. Under our oath we, as Congressmen, are bound to support a treaty, even if a platform provision, otherwise valid, contradicts it. If we are correct in our construction of the treaty, we can not under any condition regard that sentence in the platform, but no Democrat can hide behind that as an excuse, because it has been construed by the Chief Executive of the country, the titular head of the party, the one authority upon any mooted provision in the platform, with the advice and counsel of the chairman of the platform committee which made the plank. I do not know of any other authority to resolve a doubt, if any Democrat has one.

The head of the party and the chairman of the platform committee of the convention concur in telling us that there is nothing in that sentence to prevent our repealing these discriminating clauses, and no Democrat, whatever his conversations or promises may have been at home or whatever the erroneous notions of his constituents may be, can have any trouble as to the result from following the head of his party, who has the right to construe and decide such matters. I would not measure other people's consciences nor criticize their motives nor fix their guilt, but there is still a higher reason—any intelligent man not interested in ship subsidy nor biased in his friendship to people who are interested therein must know at first blush that there is no warrant in morals for us to vote away from the Treasury $2,000,000 of the people's money and give it to a few capitalists who control the ships and the railroads. The divine law is superior to all human laws and platforms. If every platform in the world and every statute of Congress were to provide that I should vote to take $2,000,000 of the people's money and give it to a private interest, I would say the platforms and laws are void, because in conflict with the divine law.

I have had the smartest Congressmen in three of the coast States delegations to tell me that I was absolutely right in my contention; but that as their friends at home felt the other way, they would be compelled to vote against me. I wish to say, without impugning any man's motives, that a man whose conscience and judgment teach him what is right ought to listen to the voice of his constituents, and if every man, woman, and child in his district should ask him to do what he knows in his own conscience and judgment not to be right, he ought to resign and go home and let them send another man here. Even if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] feel constrained to continue to support the discrimination solely because it is in the Democratic platform, I insist that that sentence in the Democratic platform furnishes no excuse for any Democrat to vote against this repeal. The other charge is that we must not yield to the President; that the President is trying to coerce Congress. There was never a more foolish or unfounded proposition set up. Although I have known for more than a year that the President was in favor of honesty and equality, as advocated by our committee, and although others have known it for a long time, he has made absolutely no effort to coerce Congress.

On the other hand, for several months he has stated, through the public press, to Members of Congress and the Senate that he was making no effort to influence Congress to pass the repeal; he was simply stating his views of the matter, his construction of the platform, and advising Members and Senators of his embarrassment in managing the foreign affairs of the Government by reason of this exemption. I was glad when he came around to support the committee's view; and while it is true that a great many Members have gone up to see him on this and other subjects, and the newspapers have made various statements as to what was supposed to have occurred, I beg to assure gentlemen who are hesitating on that ground that I have given the President more advice on the subject than he has ever given me, and I think he has learned more about it from me than I have ever learned from him on the subject; and if you gentlemen do not like to yield to the President, you can just eliminate that from your consideration and come on and go with me, because you know I will not mislead you nor try to coerce you. Together with our committee, I begged you to do right about this matter before the mistake was made. The President for a long time would not consent to come down and deliver his message in person, saying that the matter was so plain that it was not necessary for him to make the matter so emphatic; and all that ever induced him to come was the plea of certain Democrats who had made the mistake of voting wrong before and, like schoolboys, having done wrong, did not have the moral courage to do right—"take it back," as they call it. They did not hesitate to represent to us that the President would relieve their embarrassment and enable them to relieve his embarrassment if he would publicly ask them and take the responsibility of stating that the foreign policy of the Government required this repeal. He came and delivered the message and those Democrats became more active in opposition—increased the President's embarrassment and perhaps secured their own future embarrassment by fighting the proposition harder than ever. This thing is not done in a corner, and no man has hidden his tracks.

Terrible hurrah is made about what the President has asked Congress to do. Is that anything new? Have the Tammany Representatives forgotten when that other great Democratic President was in the White House, and not only told Congress that the silver-purchase law ought to be repealed, but that it should be repealed, and that until repealed nothing else should be done, either in the way of legislation or distribution of patronage? Do they forget the similar conduct of all the other Presidents up to the days of the great author of the Bull Moose Party, when he had so much trouble with Congress on his hands and had to send so many messages before he could get them to comply with his wishes? Have they forgotten that under Mr. Taft's administration two copies of an administration bill were made, revolutionizing our entire regulation of commerce, and a copy sent to each House with orders to Congress to pass it? Do Members forget the dramatic day when the martyr McKinley had barely signified in a general way that the foreign relations of the Government were in jeopardy when this House, by unanimous vote, placed $50,000,000 in his hands at his discretion? That nobody in any party questioned his honesty or integrity, that nobody at the behest of selfish special interests offered unpardonable—yea, treasonable—resolutions inquiring into the facts and reasons, which all civilized men know are sacredly secret in conducting the foreign affairs of any Government? Nobody then rose and cursed England in that dread hour, but she was relied upon in the crisis, and she failed us not; neither has she ever failed us in such a crisis. Who knows what the situation at this time may be better than the President, who is peculiarly charged under the Constitution with responsibility for foreign affairs. He has come down and told us, in order to insure successful conduct of the foreign affairs of this Government, that this repeal should be made at once. It is not patriotic for Republicans or Bull Moosers on partisan grounds to question his veracity or honesty and embarrass his action in connection with foreign relations. It would certainly be unpardonable in any Democrat to do so. Yet he has been talked about by men in all parties as though he was a cheap trickster or trader dickering in wares and seeking to impose on the credulity of customers. He has been requested, by resolution and otherwise, contrary to propriety, usage, and safety, to divulge the state secrets and lay bare to the world the danger points.

I will not be impolite enough to accuse anybody of treasonable motives or conduct, but it seems to me when the President of whatever party emphasizes the dire extremity of the Government by going in person to Congress and describing an obstacle to the safe conduct of foreign affairs and asking that that be removed under the necessity of national safety and national honor, that no man can escape by quibble or sophistry. Every man must step out and answer, "Under whose banner do you train; under which King Bezonian?" There is no escape from it. Whoever fights this repeal now not only fights the honest equality and domestic economy of his people, but he fights the administration on the foreign policy of the Government, and if disaster results he must take his place and share the odium and responsibility for whatever disaster may come. Cheap and vulgar criticism has even been indulged about the motives and details of the President's plan. He has been charged, without foundation, with dickering with Governments and trading for help and peace. Nations do not do business in that vulgar way; the pothouse politician will have to broaden his vision and enlarge his mental caliber. Nations, like individuals, feel kindly toward those who treat them fairly. There is no doubt on earth in the mind of any sensible man that England's attitude in any crisis in which we may become involved will depend on the honesty and fairness of our treatment of England. To take any other position would be idiotic.

If we ever have a general conflict, either of arms or commerce, our cause ought to be right. If I ever have to fight the battle of Armageddon, I want to be on the right side. There can be no honor in participating in that much-talked-of conflict unless you are on the side of truth and right.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to every man in this body who wishes to pass the repeal bill to vote for the previous question on this rule. [Applause.] I have seen a good many battles on the floor of this House, and I have taken part in two great rules fights. I know that if our opponents shatter the ranks of those who believe in repealing the law we are not going to be able to re-form under fire, and that is why our opponents are making this fight on the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] would consume his time.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH]. [Applause.]

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am recognized to speak on this important subject for four minutes. There are 300,000 people living in the district which I have the honor to represent. Notwithstanding that fact, I am allowed one minute more time than I am fairly entitled to under this rule. A fair division of the time allowed under this rule, if adopted, gives each Member of this House three minutes in which to speak upon a question which is not only important to the people of his district, but important to every man, woman, and child in this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, for more than two hours last evening I listened intently to the debate on this rule, hoping to hear some gentleman announce a valid reason for its adoption by this House, and I heard no reasons given. We did hear gentlemen proclaim in thunderous tones about a great crisis, about the Nation's honor, and about the necessity of keeping our contract. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] stated he wanted to correct a blunder that had been made two years ago by the American Congress. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] told us that a strong man is never ashamed to do what is right for fear of being called a craven. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what question of honor is involved in this free-toll matter to-day that was not involved two years ago, when the exemption act was passed? Why need a strong man fear to do what is right in this cause to-day without fear of being called a craven any more than he did two years ago? Were the Senators of the United States, who in overwhelming numbers voted for this exemption act, trifling with the Nation's honor, or were they afraid to do the right thing for fear of being called cravens?

Mr. Speaker, why should the Members of this body try to fool themselves? They may be very well assured they can not fool the people by talking about the Nation's honor. Does the President say anything about doing the right thing and about the Nation's honor? No, indeed. The President says that we shall not discuss the question of right and wrong in this matter. He simply says that we must do this thing, whether right or wrong, or he will not know how to deal with other questions of greater delicacy and nearer consequence. At last, Mr. Speaker, the cat is out of the bag. We are told that this great crisis and these other delicate questions relate to future treaties and trade agreements made or to be made between the United States and foreign nations. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, nothing has occurred during this administration which emphasizes the need of the Progressive Party and a Roosevelt in the White House more than this attempt to reverse a national policy established by our Government in 1787, and to do it in the name of the Nation's honor.

A day or two ago the leader of the Republican minority [Mr. MANN], while discussing the Mexican situation, made the remark, "Would to God we had a Roosevelt in the White House!"

I promise you now, my Democratic and Republican friends, that if you pass this Sims bill the people will see to it that Roosevelt will go into the White House in 1916.

Mr. Speaker, the President tells us the exemption act was a great economic mistake. Surely the President must have discovered this economic error on our part since he made his speech to the farmers of New Jersey in August, 1912, for in that speech he said:

> We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Let us examine this economic mistake and find out if possible just when and where we went wrong. I contend that it has been the unbroken policy of this Nation from the very beginning of the Government to grant free passage for its vessels of domestic commerce on all of its navigable waters, canals, rivers, and lakes, and I assume that it will of course be conceded that American coastwise shipping is domestic commerce. Our Government under the Articles of Confederation passed an ordinance creating the Northwest territory, known as the act of July 13, 1787.

Article 4 of that act provides:

> The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence and the carrying places between the same shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the Confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty thereon. Section 9 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

The language of the ordinance of 1787 was carried into the act of March 2, 1805, creating the territorial government of Orleans.

And section 1 of the act which admitted Louisiana provided that it shall be taken as a condition upon which the State is incorporated into the Union that the Mississippi River and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same and into the Gulf of Mexico shall be common highways and forever free, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor imposed by said State.

June 4, 1812, Congress passed an act for the government of the Territory of Missouri, and section 15 of that act provided that—

> The Mississippi and Missouri Rivers and the navigable waters flowing into them and the carrying places between the same shall be common highways and forever free to the people of said Territory, and to the citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, or impost therefor.

Mr. Speaker, practically the same language was carried into the acts of Congress creating many other territorial governments.

It will thus be seen that the economic mistake to which the President refers in his message has been a mistake made by our Government from its very foundation. The rivers and harbors act of 1884 provided that vessels of all kinds engaged in domestic commerce on our canals, rivers, and lakes should be free from the payment of tolls. We have expended many millions of dollars in the improvement of our inland canals, rivers, and harbors, and as far as possible and as rapidly as possible we have endeavored to remove all obstacles from the path of our waterway commerce. Our purpose in doing this was primarily for the regulation and control of railroad rates in the interest of the American people.

Prof. Emory Johnson, the expert who furnished the information on which the Government fixed the toll charges through the Panama Canal at $1.25 per ton, estimates that free tolls to American coastwise ships will save to the American people in 10 years the enormous sum of $100,000,000 in reduced freight charges.

Mr. Speaker, in the name of the brave men whose splendid devotion to duty made possible the construction of that wonderful canal at Panama; in the name of the Nation's dignity and honor; in the name of the generations yet unborn, I protest with all the strength of which I am capable against this abject surrender to a foreign power. We were told by the President that we must make this surrender without question or he will not know "how to deal with other questions of nearer consequence and greater delicacy." What are those questions of nearer consequence and greater delicacy for which we are to surrender our national dignity and for which we are to confess that the Congress, a President of the United States, and two great parties were guilty of deliberately wronging a foreign nation by violating the terms of a solemn treaty?

Are we a lot of school children who must obey orders from the master without asking impudent questions? Has the legislative branch of the Government ever been subjected to such humiliation?

If this were a request to submit the question of free tolls to arbitration, we might, albeit somewhat reluctantly, vote for such a proposition, but we are led by the Nation's Chief to a complete surrender and reversal of a national policy which confesses dishonor and admits our guilt.

After 400 years of wasted effort the construction of the Panama Canal was made possible by Theodore Roosevelt, then President of the United States. On the 18th of January, 1913, ex-President Roosevelt, speaking of the exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, said:

> I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken, not by a private corporation, but by a Nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

The Panama Canal was built by our Government for two reasons—one naval and military, and the other economic.

It was believed that a canal across the Isthmus would be of great assistance to the Army and Navy in time of peace as well as in time of war. In time of peace it was thought that the canal could be utilized by the Government to distribute our troops and war vessels where they might be needed quickly and economically. The cost of providing our troops and warships with supplies, it was believed, would be considerably decreased. The economic effect of completing the canal, to a degree at least, should be the same for the Army and Navy as for commerce. In time of war the great value of the canal would be the increased ability of the United States to concentrate its warships at a given point where they might be most needed. In the event of war the importance of the canal from a military standpoint would depend entirely upon the right and the ability of the United States to control beyond question the Pacific and Atlantic approaches. As a matter of fact, the Government has already expended many millions of dollars in the construction of impregnable fortifications commanding both the Atlantic and Pacific entrances to the canal.

If those who argue that the exemption act of 1912 was in violation of our treaty with England are correct, then we had no right to construct these great fortifications. If they are correct, then we must pay tolls on our own warships in time of peace as well as in time of war, a thing which is on its face ridiculous. If they are right in their construction of the treaty, then in case of war with any foreign nation the United States as a belligerent would not be permitted to embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit must be resumed with all possible dispatch. If they are correct, the United States, in case of war with a foreign nation, would not be permitted to keep its war vessels within 3 miles of the entrance to the canal longer than 24 hours at one time, except in case of distress. If those who construed this treaty in favor of Great Britain are correct, then in case of war with a foreign nation the United States will be compelled to pass the enemey's warships through our canal and would not be permitted to follow with its own warships until 24 hours had elapsed after the departure of the warships of our enemy.

When the exemption act was debated and passed in the Senate, in 1912, it was universally admitted that our Government under the treaty could consider and treat the canal as a part of our coast line.

The United States, as owner of the canal, adopted the rules set out in the treaty for the regulation of the canal, and then this treaty provided that—

> The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Certainly the average American citizen must consider it ridiculous to interpret the words "all nations observing these rules" as intending to include the United States, which owns the canal and which made the rules. Moreover, there can be no discrimination or injustice because of the exemption act of August, 1912, for under our laws the vessels of foreign nations are not permitted to participate in the coastwise shipping trade of America, and it follows, of course, that there can not under such circumstances be any competition or rivalry between such classes of vessels. How can there be any discrimination where it is impossible that there should be any competition? It has been well said:

> The United States has never in any way parted with or abridged its rights to exempt its coasting vessels from charges or canal tolls. Whatever may be the undefined dangers referred to by the President when he urges Congress to repeal the canal-tolls act, Congress certainly will increase our ultimate risks and lower the dignity of our Nation in yielding a right which it already has asserted that the Nation possesses, until it shall be clearly shown that we must yield this right because we are too weak to defend our rights, but surely that time has not yet arrived.

It is clear that the language "all nations observing these rules" must refer to nations other than the United States. The United States stands as the maker of these rules. The other nations of the earth stand in the position of those who are to observe the rules and for whose observation the rules were made. No other reasonable construction can be given to those words in view of the language used in connection with the preceding declaration that "The United States adopts" these rules. A more careful examination of the rules adopted by the United States makes it certain that they were intended for the observance of other nations. It is provided that the canal shall never be blockaded. This, of course, can mean nothing except that the canal shall never be blockaded by nations other than the United States—those other nations "observing these rules."

There are men in this House who seriously contend that we violated the treaty of 1901 when we inserted the exemption clause in the canal act of August, 1912.

Let us examine this treaty carefully and apply the rule of construction and interpretation acknowledged by writers on international law to be the standard rule, namely:

> When the language of the treaty, taken in the ordinary meaning of the words, yields a plain and reasonable sense, it must be taken as intended to be read in that sense, subject to the qualification that any words which may have a customary meaning in treaties differing from their common signification must be understood to have that meaning.

It is universally conceded that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was repealed by article 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that is true, even if it could be argued that a reservation remained in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is true because of the well-known rule of construction that the language of the treaty itself must prevail as against the language of its preamble.

Article 2 of the treaty confers upon the United States all power and all the rights which are incident to the ownership of the canal, and in express terms provides that the United States shall have the exclusive right to regulate and manage the canal. Under this article of the treaty the ordinary rights of sovereignty are conferred upon the United States without limitation, either in time of peace or in time of war.

Article 3 does impose a restriction or limitation of neutralization in practically the same sense as the treaty of Constantinople neutralizes the Suez Canal, under the terms of which it has never been contended that Great Britain could not grant free passage to her ships. In article 3 it is further provided that the United States shall adopt rules for the navigation of the canal substantially like those embodied in the treaty of Constantinople for the Suez Canal, and rule 1 of article 3 provides that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations "observing these rules."

Under the powers conferred in article 3, the United States has been declared the interstate commission of the world in respect of all traffic that uses the Panama Canal. How the United States will exercise these powers is a matter entirely within the discretion of the United States. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty confers no right of veto upon Great Britain.

It comes with mighty poor grace from Great Britain to attempt to interfere or to take advantage of the conditions in Mexico to impose her demands upon the United States Government at this time. Under the powers granted the United States in article 2 of the treaty, the conclusion is irresistible that the parties never intended that "vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules" should be entitled to use the canal "on terms of entire equality" with the United States, but the intention was on terms of equality among themselves, so that there should be no discrimination against any of them, giving nothing. Absolutely nothing in return for the pledge of the United States to treat them all fairly and equitably at the canal.

To claim that the United States is included in the phrase "all nations observing these rules" amounts to the contention that the right of the United States to use the canal must be on terms of entire equality (with the United States) and is conditioned upon her demonstrating to herself that she is, as a belligerent, respecting the neutrality of the canal which is the property of the United States and doing it in conformity with the rules adopted by the United States. Such a claim is not only ridiculous, but incomprehensible.

As reflecting what I believe to be the sentiment of the people of the United States, I quote from an editorial in the Outlook under date of October 5, 1912:

> What is it that the United States has done? For nearly 400 years the civilized world entertained the idea of a canal through the Isthmus from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Surveys were made, plans were drawn, treaties were enacted. Finally the French people undertook the work. They failed. The American people assumed the burden. They have fought disease and death. They have struggled with engineering problems incredibly difficult. They have laid upon themselves financially an everlasting burden of over $400,000,000. All this has been done not merely for their own benefit but for the benefit of the entire world. And their final act is to say that the ships of all nations, including their own, engaged in international commerce shall share the benefits of the canal on equal terms. Not only that, they have legally fixed for the ships of the British people (who are now accusing the Americans of dishonorable practices) a rate of toll which is actually insufficient to pay the cost of maintenance of the canal. Have they (the British) given us in the matter that word of praise which we may be fairly said to deserve? If they have spoken such a word of praise, they certainly have not repeated it often enough to be in danger of overstimulating our vanity.

Congressman KNOWLAND in his minority report states the objections to the passage of the Sims bill, which is intended to repeal the exemption clause in the canal act of 1912, so forcibly that I am pleased to make them a part of my remarks. Mr. KNOWLAND says the repeal of the exemption clause in the act of 1912—

(1) Would reverse our traditional policy of an American-controlled canal. (2) That it would surrender valuable American rights without any attempt to settle through diplomacy or by arbitration. (3) That it would foreclose the right of this Government to pass through the canal without the payment of toll American battleships, revenue cutters, transports, and other Government craft. (4) That it would inaugurate a policy compelling this Government to surrender whenever a foreign power gives an interpretation to a treaty contrary to that held by the United States; would compel us to abrogate our treaty with the Republic of Panama and to repeal section 11 of the canal act, which seeks to prevent railroad-owned ships from operating through the waterway in competition with their rail lines. (5) That it would benefit chiefly the transcontinental railroads. (6) That it would be a compliance with the demands of the Canadian railroads, which were the instigators of the British protest. (7) That it would give an interpretation to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty wholly at variance with the interpretation given to that instrument by Senators present when the treaty was ratified. (8) That it would be an abandonment of our historic policy of free commercial intercourse between the States. (9) That it would be an interpretation of the treaty as affecting coastwise traffic contrary to the rules laid down by the Supreme Court in the Olson case. (10) That it would be an admission that Great Britain could favor British vessels, as His Majesty's Government now does, in port charges, while the United States would be barred from according different treatment to its coastwise ships.

I deeply regret that our Government has been so far outgeneraled in its foreign policy by the Governments of Mexico and Great Britain that our President has felt compelled to bow the head and bend the knee to the demands of England in the matter of Panama tolls for American coastwise shipping.

What does the President mean when he says:

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

That is the most remarkable and adroit sentence ever written into a presidential message. His shot is fired over the heads of his own party leaders, many of whom he knows will oppose him in this matter, and he appeals to all parties to help in a patriotic way his administration out of its entanglements with Mexico, and he tells us that we should do as he wishes without raising the question of whether we are right or wrong.

I have come to ask for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls. We ought to reverse our action—

Says the President—

because everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

I am at a loss to understand how the President could arrive at such a conclusion in the face of the undisputed facts. The London Law Review, which is known as the highest authority among legal publications in Great Britain, concludes a long argument on this subject in the following language:

To sum up, it is reasonably argumentable:

First. That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty. That its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and that its case is difficult to challenge on ground of general justice.

Second. That there is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act to any process of arbitration.

Third. That any aggrieved party has an appropriate and impartial and competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Panama Canal act passed the Senate by a vote of 48 to 17 after a most comprehensive debate lasting many days, and it passed the House by such a large vote that a roll call was not demanded. In addition to all this, the three great parties which are surely representative of the American people declared themselves on this important question in no uncertain terms.

DEMOCRATS, REPUBLICANS, AND PROGRESSIVES STAND FOR FREE TOLLS FOR AMERICAN SHIPS IN FACE OF ENGLAND'S PROTEST.

Democratic national platform resolution unanimously adopted at Baltimore, July, 1912, W. J. Bryan chairman of the resolutions committee:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

Progressive national platform unanimously adopted in Chicago, August, 1912, after a fiery speech by Roosevelt:

The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarily for their benefit. We demand that the canal shall be so operated as to break the transportation monopoly now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads by maintaining sea competition with them; that ships directly or indirectly owned or controlled by American railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal; and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

Republican President Taft, in special message to Congress August 19, 1912, after England's protest against free tolls for American ships, said:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I am sure that it is not the intention of Congress to violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or to enact anything inconsistent with its provisions, and that it certainly is not its purpose to repeal by subsequent enactment the treaty in so far as it represents the law of the land.

The question at once arises whether or not this issue would have been raised at this time if everything was peaceful and quiet in Mexico.

The New York American, in its issue of March 5, quotes Senator JAMES A. O'GORMAN, chairman of the Interoceanic Canals Committee of the Senate, as saying:

I yield to no one in respect for the President's motives or patriotism, and I withhold my approval of his recommendation with regret.

Believing his proposal unwise, unnecessary, and destructive of the best interest of the American people, my duty as a Senator of the United States offers me no alternative but resistance to the proposed repeal.

Ex-President Taft, Philander C. Knox, ex-Secretary of State, OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, Democratic leader in the House of Representatives, and Richard Olney, ex-Secretary of State in Mr. Cleveland's administration, have asserted that in their opinion the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls in the Panama Canal does not violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

These gentlemen are lawyers of recognized ability, and the President does not express an opinion to the contrary. He asserts, however, that no one outside of the United States defends our course.

If he will read the London Law Review he will learn that even English lawyers have conceded that the tolls exemption is in harmony with our treaty obligations. German and other continental writers have expressed the same view.

Moreover, this opinion is shared by ex-President Roosevelt, during whose administration the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was framed and made.

The President now states that the tolls exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy, but I prefer to accept his judgment announced when he was a candidate for the Presidency, when he pointed out the obvious economic advantages of this legislation.

The platform of the Democratic Party, as well as the platform of the Progressive Party, declared that American ships engaged in coastwise trade should pay no tolls, to the end that cheap transportation by water will enforce cheaper transportation by the competing transcontinental railroads.

There has been a systematic effort to confuse the real issue in this controversy; the word "vessels" as in the treaty means vessels engaged in over-seas trade. It does not embrace vessels engaged in local or domestic trade.

This was the interpretation placed by Great Britain for more than 60 years upon precisely similar language employed in the treaty of 1815. The Supreme Court of the United States in Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S.) recognized the propriety of this interpretation.

We do not exempt American ships engaged in foreign trade. Under the Panama Canal act we treat them as we treat foreign ships. We exempt only coastwise shipping, and our right to do so is substantially recognized by the British Government in its note of November 14, 1912, which states: "If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by the exemption of bona fide coastwise traffic, then England could not complain." It is apparent that we are disturbed over a claim which Great Britain concedes to be groundless.

If we must purchase foreign friendship, the price exacted must not involve us in national dishonor and repudiation of party pledges upon which this administration secured office.

The people of the Nation, whose representatives we are, have had an opportunity to approve or disapprove those party pledges. No man can doubt that so far as opportunity afforded the people have most emphatically indorsed and approved the Nation's course on this question. Approximately 7,000,000 voters of the Democratic faith supported the Democratic platform and its presidential candidate in an honest, straightforward declaration for free tolls for American coastwise shipping; 4,200,000 voters of the Progressive Party declared in no uncertain manner for free tolls; 3,000,000 Republican voters supported a Republican Senate and a Republican President in the passage of the exemption act in 1912 in the face of England's protest; 14,000,000 voters have declared their faith in the doctrine that the exemption clause in the canal act of August, 1912, was not in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with Great Britain.

President Wilson, who now insists that we must reverse that policy, whether right or wrong, was of a totally different opinion when he was a candidate for the Presidency. On the 15th day of August, 1912, at Washington Park, N. J., Mr. Wilson, speaking to an audience of farmers, said in part:

We are digging a tremendous ditch across the Isthmus of Panama. What interest have you in opening it to the ships of the world? We do not own the ships of the world. By a very ingenious process which I would not keep you standing in the hot sun long enough to outline—the legislation of the United States has destroyed the merchant marine of the United States.

One of the objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific via the Atlantic ports.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending, passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House, provides for free tolls for American shipping through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by an American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

The farmers of this country are, in my judgment, just as much concerned in the policy of the United States with regard to that canal as any other class of citizens of the United States. Everything that is done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men.

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies; it means business—it means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

In that speech he told the American farmer that the act which had just passed the Senate providing for free tolls for American ships in the coastwise trade and prohibiting any ships owned by American railroad companies from passing through the canal was a good thing and bound to be in their interests. He said to the farmers at that time:

You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. The farmers of this country are just as much concerned in the policy of the United States with regard to that canal as any other class of citizens. Everything that is done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmers as well as for other men.

The President also at that time emphasized the necessity of standing by his party platform when he said:

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies; it means business; it means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the plank in the Democratic platform declaring for free tolls was just as clear and unequivocal as was their plank on the tariff and on the trusts, and the rank and file of the Democratic Party as well as the American people generally had just as much right to expect that the President would stand by his party pledge on free tolls for American ships as they did that he would stand firmly on the party pledge for a revenue tariff and for the destruction of private monopoly.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the adoption of the pending rule and the previous question, because I think ample time has been accorded for the discussion of both the rule and for the main proposition, which is as plain as the English language can make it. I shall vote for the repeal of that clause which is mentioned in the Sims bill, and which exempts coastwise vessels from paying toll, for the reason that I think by the adoption of that clause an economic mistake was committed. I shall vote for the bill because I am a Democrat. [Applause.] And I believe in upholding the hand of one of the greatest Democratic Presidents that ever graced the White House. [Loud applause.] I shall vote for it because I see that those who are firing upon the Democratic flag to-day and its bearer, and unfairly and partially quoting from the Democratic platform, are on the other side of the Chamber. And during 17 years of service in this House I never knew before to-day the leaders of the opposition to the Democratic Party to advocate the observance of any part of a Democratic platform. I shall vote for this because it is right. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the President when he made his appeal to Congress made that appeal to the ordinary Members of Congress as well as to the members of his party; as well to the members of the great committees of this House as to the leadership of this House. And any Member of this House, an ordinary Member of this House, a new Member of this House, finds himself in the same position of responsibility to his constituents that any member of the great committees or any one of the so-called leaders of this House finds himself. We have heard much, and in the course of this debate will hear more, of ponderous platitudes in regard to national honor, coupled with much learned and profound discussion of treaties with hyphenated names.

But if it were not, I believe, for the appeal that has been made by the President here, which has undoubtedly embarrassed the individual Members, there would be no doubt as to how this question would be determined by the ordinary Member of Congress. And I believe without question that it would be determined in favor of the American people's right to control their internal affairs without the consent of any other nation on earth [applause]; and that is good Democratic doctrine. [Renewed applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is peculiarly unfortunate at this time, as I think it is always unfortunate, for any body of men who assume leadership here to attempt to bind and gag any of the individual Members of this House in their right to amend a bill or in their right to debate. The Republican leader was right when he said that this was an outrageous example of gag rule, and I noticed that he was enthusiastically jeered by those who propose this rule, on the ground, I suppose, that his action was an example of the pot calling the kettle black. But no matter who has advocated this method in the past, there are a great many Members who are earnestly desirous of serving the country and their constituents here who will not, at a time like this, consent to be throttled on a question of this kind. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I am from California, where most of the people are supposed to be in favor of free tolls, but I want to say there are more people in California who believe in individuals obeying contracts and nations observing treaties than there are who believe in tolls of any kind.

First, before I had really thought or read much on the subject, I was in favor of the exemption [laughter on the Republican side], but when I read the Clayton-Bulwer and the Hay-Pauncefote treaties and made a study of the matter I viewed the subject from a much broader standpoint and came to the conclusion there is no question but what the makers and ratifiers of the treaties expected us to do exactly what we promised to do—see that the canal should be free and open on terms of entire equality to citizens of all nations observing the rules of the canal, and because I believe in obeying contracts of every kind I shall vote for this rule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I had intended, on the patriotic grounds so strongly urged by the sincere and able President of all the people, to vote for the repeal, in order to clear the way for diplomatic negotiations concerning the construction of the treaty, believing that the specific act of exempting from tolls the vessels of a steamship corporation is not, after all, a vital national matter, and that by so doing I would be discharging a patriotic duty to assist the President in avoiding embarrassing international complications.

When I saw a few days ago the plain, blunt repeal embodied in the Sims bill, without a single saving clause, I determined at once to offer the following amendment, which I thought could be conscientiously indorsed by every Member of this House:

Insert, after the word "repeal," in the tenth line of the first section of said Sims bill, the following, to wit: "Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as denying or waiving any right of the United States to grant exemption of tolls to its vessels of war and commerce."

[Applause on the Republican side.]

But, to my utter astonishment, on yesterday the omniscient Committee on Rules informed this House that it did not have intelligence enough, patriotism enough, power enough, to embody in this bill an appropriate expression of its intention, but that, forsooth, the committee had already decided, to the dotting of an "i" and the crossing of a "t," just what we must say, and no amendment from any Member should be even considered by this House. Mr. Speaker, I denounce that decision of the Committee on Rules as an unwarranted, high-handed assumption of power that I for one will not indorse. I have heretofore consistently condemned such cloture rules when other important bills were before this House, and I will not indorse them now.

If ever a bill needed amendment, this bill does. According to well-settled principles of international law the subsequent action of a party to a treaty, especially against its own interests, can properly be considered in arriving at the true intent of the high contracting parties when a controversy arises between them concerning its construction. For this reason it is highly important that the proposed repeal of the tolls-exemption clause should be expressed in such language as to clearly show that by such repeal we do not waive any right, but that we repeal this law as a matter of international courtesy, so as to facilitate the settlement of the question raised by diplomatic negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, pass this bill as it reads, and when in time of war our enemy claims the right to pass through our canal to attack our coasts and appeals to all nations to enforce that right they can say to us, "Your treaty says 'the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations * * * on terms of entire equality'—the ships of war are put on the same plane in that treaty as the ships of commerce—and by that repeal law you have acknowledged, without qualification, that you must treat the merchant ships of all nations, including your own, just alike. You are therefore logically obliged, under that construction of your treaty, to grant equal rights to vessels of war."

Mr. Speaker, I want to vote patriotically on this measure, but true patriotism contemplates not only the immediate difficulties of the present but also the contingencies of the future. I shall never vote to indorse this autocratic "gag rule." I shall never vote, directly or indirectly, against the sovereignty of the United States over its own property in time of war—that sovereignty that rises higher than any treaty, any written law—it is the law of self-preservation—the first law of nature. And so if you ask me to indorse this Sims bill without amendment and thus construe this treaty to mean that in time of conflict we can not land our troops nor munitions of war—if you ask me to assist in preparing an invitation to a foreign foe to kindly use our canal to facilitate the passage of their attacking ships of war to our coasts—if you ask me to shut my eyes to the future and blindly vote to relieve the exigencies of the present—my answer is an emphatic "No." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], I take this position because I am a Democrat. [Applause.] Evidently between us there is a difference in the definition of "Democracy." He doubtless takes the Democracy of this Nation to be the President. I do not. I deny the right either of the President or of this Congress to determine what is Democracy. Democracy is made in a representative convention duly assembled by the people. [Applause.]

I hear gentlemen say that we should not break our word. But the first sense of honor and of integrity and of veracity must begin at home. Our own promise to the people who intrusted us with their commission here is that we are in favor of the old principle of "free ships and free seas," and here we are asked to abolish that.

I am most astonished at the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who last spring joined that little column who wanted to adhere to the Democratic platform for a provision prohibiting interlocking directorates and against an asset currency, and for a bill that would give the farmer a system of rural credits; but I find him now faint and weary at the roadside as our little column marches by. [Applause.] It is our duty first to keep our faith in interlocking directorates prohibition and to pass the farmers' credit plan we made to the people before we are so anxious to violate a platform pledge to our own people in order to please England.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, this is a solemn moment for the Democratic Party. Twenty-one years ago next August, when the Members of Congress assembled here as the representatives of the American people and held a caucus to determine whether or not they would repeal the "purchasing clause of the Sherman silver act," more than a majority met in the first caucus in favor of the Democratic doctrine, but by reason of patronage and otherwise—White House pressure—they followed a false leader away. You may now call the roll, and not a single one of those men who violated the Democratic platform then can now be named in public life. [Applause.] A man who violates his party platform, as is sought to be done here twice, will find himself "retired to a very private retreat." [Applause.]

We are here asked to violate our pledges twice in the same transaction—first, by a "gag" rule that will not permit the bill to be amended or an amendment to be offered, a thing that every Democratic nominee down to road overseer denounced in the campaign of 1912. You do this because you know that, if permitted, this House would put a preamble to this bill reciting our right to do as we please with this property; and yet we are not permitted to offer the only amendment that would sustain our nationality over the canal. And, second, we are asked to violate our pledge to the people by making a toll charge through the canal on American ships, when our platform favored free tolls. I am opposed to this "gag" rule, moreover, because if we are to stab our own party to death and a national policy of free "sees" of 100 years, we ought to have more time in which to commit the murder. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] whether he expects to conclude in one speech?

Mr. HENRY. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill. For that reason you may naturally say that I am opposed to a rule for its consideration. I regret that the bill should be before the House. I hope that it will be defeated. [Applause.] But the President of the United States having laid this important question before the Congress, I believe it should be considered [applause], but considered in the proper way. [Applause.]

I have served from one Democratic administration to another. I have never scratched a party ticket; I have always endeavored to live up to and sustain my party's platform. [Applause.] The Democratic Party, not I, wrote this provision as to free tolls in its platform. I believe this plank of the platform is right. [Applause.] Believing it is right, there is but one position that I can take, and that is to sustain the position of my party as expressed in its convention and in its platform.

I regret, of course, that I differ with the President of the United States, and that I am compelled to differ with many of my colleagues here. But I say to you if either you or I are to make a mistake in this matter let it be one mistake. Let us not to-day turn our faces against the principles we fought for; let us not close our ears against a battle cry that first made a Democratic majority in this House possible.

There are 50 men facing me on the floor of this House to-day whose seats would be occupied by Republicans if it had not been for the fight the Democratic Party made in the Sixty-first Congress against an unreasonable exercise of the power of cloture. We passed a great tariff bill in this House without its being necessary to invoke a cloture rule. We have passed a currency bill without the exercise of a cloture rule. The American people believe in what I say, and they showed their belief by electing a Democratic Sixty-second Congress.

The majority of this House has the right to legislate, but the minority has a right to be heard and to propose reasonable amendments. When you deny that right to the minority you deny it in the face of the action of the constituencies that sent you here. [Applause.] If there was an effort to defeat this bill by an unreasonable filibuster, the majority of this House would have the right to bring in a rule and force a vote. The bill has not been launched or tried yet. There are but two paragraphs in it. So far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to agree to the first clause in the rule, providing that this bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that it shall be a continuing order until it is completed; but when you grant a rule of that kind, for which I am willing to vote—and if you vote down the previous question I will, if recognized for the purpose, offer a substitute to that effect—then you put it in the power of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], chairman of the committee having the bill in charge, to move the previous question at any time and at any hour, and cut off debate and amendment if he has a majority of this House willing to vote with him; and if he has not, he ought not to cut off debate and ought not to cut off amendment. [Applause.] Now, that is the whole question, and you know it.

But there is a more serious problem behind this question. You are asked to foreclose your judgment on one of the most important questions that has ever confronted the American people before you have heard the debate and before you have seen the proposed amendments. You are not only asked to adopt a rule that will pass in this House what the President of the United States asks for, to cut away from our coastwise ships the right of free tolls, but you are asked to foreclose this question as to all shipping for all time to come. [Applause.]

I regret to differ with my colleagues, the men on this side of the House who have upheld my hands. I do not question your honesty, because I know that no man ever faced a set of men who possess more honesty and courage than the men I am facing to-day; but, in my judgment, you are making a serious mistake to adopt this cloture rule, and I would not be worthy to hold your commission as the leader on this side of the House if, believing that you are making a serious mistake, I did not have the courage to stand here and tell you so, in spite of everything. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, have gentlemen on the other side consumed all of their time?

The SPEAKER. All the time is consumed except 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 14 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems to me that this argument can be summarized in a very few sentences. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] appeals to his colleagues on this side to support a Democratic plank. I appeal to Democrats to support Democratic doctrines that are fundamental and as old as Jefferson, against special privileges to any man or to any class of men on this earth. [Applause.] And if in any way at any time we have gotten a contrary declaration in a Democratic platform, it is just as unavailing, just as little binding as if you had put in a Democratic platform a declaration for a high protective tariff. [Applause.]

What are the rights of majorities and minorities in all parliamentary bodies? It is the right of the majority to dispatch the public business in an orderly and a moderately expeditious manner and to yield to nothing that interferes with that great object for which parliaments and congresses meet. What are the rights of minorities? The rights of minorities are that they shall have a reasonable opportunity for debate and a reasonable opportunity to offer amendments. I think I can demonstrate to every gentleman on this floor whose mind is open on this question that we have not denied any right to which the minority in this body is fairly and justly entitled. Reasonable debate! Have we not given it to you? Three hours on this rule and 20 hours on this bill—four days of talk, talk, talk. What man believes that it will change a vote or affect in the smallest particular this great result? Talk, talk, talk! No wonder the majority of the American people applauded, for some reasons, while they disagreed with him for others, the sentiment of President Roosevelt, who said:

> I came down here to Washington and found that the American Congress had been talking and discussing and debating, for days and weeks and months, how they should dig the Panama Canal and how they should acquire the Canal Zone; and that Congress kept on talking and talking and talking and—said Roosevelt—

> I took the canal while they were talking.

When there was a particularly garrulous session of the legislature of my own State of Georgia, a session that would not adjourn, and word was sent to that old lion, Robert Toombs, who lay dying, that the Georgia Legislature was still in session, the old man turned over in his bed and said wearily, "Send for Cromwell, send for Cromwell, send for Cromwell." We have given you all the talk you need, and what we want is action, the vindication of American honor, the vindication of Democratic principles. Have you had enough talk? Do you say not? Let me ask you how much talk you had when you fastened this iniquity on the American people, when you adopted section 5 of the canal bill on May 21, 1912? You had three hours' debate, and now 23 hours' debate is "gag rule." [Applause.]

"Oh," they say, "you have not given us a reasonable opportunity for amendment." I say we have given you full, ample opportunity—all the opportunity that this question requires. [Laughter.] Oh, gentlemen, possess your souls in patience. This is not a tariff bill with 4,000 items that might be raised or lowered. This is not a currency bill with many and difficult and complex provisions that might be changed. This is not an appropriation bill with hundreds and thousands of items that might be increased or decreased. This is a plain, simple proposition: Shall we give these American ships this exemption or not? And we can answer that question "yes" or "no." There is no need of dodging; there is no need of evading it; there is no need of amendment. Let this Congress answer "yes" or "no." Will you stand by this great Democratic President in his plea for the national honor? Yes or no? Under which flag will you fight? Will you fight under the flag of these gentlemen who assail their own party leadership and desert their own administration, stabbing it in the back without a moment's notice and without an instant's warning, or will you follow that glorious Democrat from New Jersey who has made this country its greatest President since the days of Thomas Jefferson? [Applause.]

But gentlemen say we have not given them a reasonable opportunity for debate, and the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, whom we all love personally and who presides over the destinies of this House, joined last night in the eleventh-hour assault upon the administration of his own party. [Applause.] I want to ask the gentleman if he does not realize that if we tear Woodrow Wilson down there is no hope or chance for any other Democrat in this land? I ask the gentleman if he does not realize that this is a question in which petty politics can not be played; that this is a question that appeals to American manhood and to every citizen of this country who believes that a nation should be as honorable in its observance of contracts as an individual? I ask the gentleman from Missouri if he does not realize what every Democrat in this country knows, that we must support the administration or be turned into the wilderness for 40 years more? [Applause.]

Now let us see exactly what this issue is. The gentlemen say that they want to amend this proposition. Driven from the ground that they have not been given reasonable opportunity for debate, when we give them seven times as much as they asked and got when they were passing the proposition the other way, they say, "You give us no opportunity to amend." The only amendment suggested here was that we might arbitrate the meaning of the treaties, and if the arbitration resulted favorably to the contention that we were entitled to make the discrimination in favor of American ships, we could authorize the President to thereupon lower the rates. I want to ask the gentlemen if they could not put that proposition, and every other one suggested, hinted at, or even whispered on the floor, into the motion to recommit, for which the rule provides. [Applause.]

If they can get a majority, they can put it into instantaneous effect as an amendment to the bill, and they know it. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said just now that if the previous amendment were voted down, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], chairman of the committee reporting this measure, could demand the previous question at any time, and if a majority of the House sustained him there would be no "gag" law. That is what we are doing. The previous question is not to be ordered unless a majority of the House so declares. The principle is exactly the same; there is no difference between the two propositions. Neither by a special rule or a general rule can any man in this House accomplish anything of this kind that a majority of the Members do not assent to.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the fact that when the Sixty-second Congress was organized, the first Democratic Congress we had had in 16 years, to which the gentleman from Missouri alluded in his statement last night, its first act after electing its officers was to adopt the rules. What were those rules? There were 49 rules, two with 57 subsections each, and yet on the 5th day of April, 1911, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] offered a resolution which provided what? It provided that all of these rules should be voted on en bloc after four hours' debate, and that the minority should be allowed to offer only one substitute proposition and "without intervening motion or delay, or anything else except offering one substitute, the previous question should be ordered on the motion of the gentleman from Texas."

Two hours' debate on a side; the distinguished Speaker of this House participated in all the conferences on that question; why did he not then raise his voice in indignant protest about the gag rule against which he now declaims? Not only that, but the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] voted with us on that proposition, voting "yea" on the record vote, in favor of the order proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Now let me show you what the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said about this action on the rules at that time, so that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] may remember the opinion his ally of to-day had of him then.

On April 5, 1911, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said:

Mr. Speaker, I believe the proposed rules are, in the main, an improvement over the rules of the Sixty-first Congress, but they fall far short of what should be embodied in the rules governing this body. For a number of years there has been upon this side of the House a little group of Republicans called "insurgents," who have been fighting for freedom in this House—freedom of debate, freedom of amendment—and during those many contests they have had almost the unanimous support of the Democratic minority. What is the situation before us to-day? You have adopted a resolution as drastic in effect, as subversive of freedom in this House, as any resolution that has ever been adopted in the House of Representatives.

Now, during the time that that "outrage" was being perpetrated the Speaker did not once raise his voice in indignant protest, but assented to the special order, and the gentleman from Alabama voted for it. I leave it to the gentleman from Wisconsin to-day as to what he thinks of their conduct then.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Democratic Members of this body, and to all men who put national honor above petty party advantage, and who would scorn to seek a petty party advantage on such a question as this, to rally to our great President, to rally to our rights on the floor of the House, vote up the previous question, and let us give the House a fair consideration of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the previous agreement, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves the previous question.

Mr. MANN. On that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the Clerk begins to call the roll, I ask the Chair to call attention to the rule of the House which prohibits Members during the calling of the roll appearing at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The rule, which is frequently violated through inadvertence, is that during the calling of the roll no Member, and no one except the officers of the House, shall disturb the proceedings at the desk. The Chair hopes that during this call there will be quiet, so that no mistakes will be made. Unless there be quiet, then to-morrow a number of Members will be rising to correct the RECORD. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of ordering the previous question will, when their names are called, answer "aye" and those opposed "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 208, nays 177, answered "present" 3, not voting 45, as follows:

PANAMA TOLLS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I should think the Clerk would read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 10 hours.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the bill should be read, I suppose, unless the reading is dispensed with. It is a short one, and perhaps we had better have it read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to dispense with the reading of the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. Let the Clerk read it; it is short.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence in section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, which reads as follows: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the third sentence of the third paragraph of said section of said act be so amended as to read as follows: "When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less than 75 cents per net registered ton, subject, however, to the provisions of article 19 of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama, entered into November 18, 1903."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Invalid Pensions desire that I yield to them in order to make a proposition to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, it will be taken out of the time of the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I can not do it. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] 45 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I hope to discuss this bill in a dispassionate manner, and do not desire to gain any votes if we can not convince the judgment of reasonable, fair-minded men that we are right.

Mr. Speaker, it is my earnest belief that considerations of national honor and good faith demand the speedy consideration and passage of this bill, and that the Panama Canal shall remain for all time open to the vessels of commerce of all nations on terms of entire equality, and that such vessels of commerce owned by citizens of the United States were intended to receive no preferential treatment, and that any variation from this construction of the treaty of 1901 is a plain violation of both the letter and spirit of that treaty.

A treaty is simply a contract or agreement between nations as between private individuals, and the intention of the parties to the contract is the true rule of construction. In the present contention as to the Hay-Pauncefote and Panama treaties the contracting parties, as it were, are both living and subscribing witnesses are not all dead, and the events leading to the making of these treaties are so recent as to remain fresh in the minds of all men.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made at our solicitation in order to enable us to construct an isthmian canal ourselves, directly, or by way of aiding a corporation or private company to construct and operate same.

Mr. Speaker, at the time of making the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we did not own or exercise sovereignty over one square foot of land in Central America, nor did we at that time contemplate the ownership or the exercise of sovereignty over one square inch of territory in any country through which a transisthmian canal could be constructed. But to show conclusively that we had no purpose of any other than "equal treatment" for the vessels of all nations, even if we should ever at any time become the sovereign of the country through which the canal might be constructed, it was specifically provided in the treaty that no change of sovereignty of the country through which the canal might be constructed should alter or change the terms of the treaty. When a change of sovereignty in part did come about by which the negotiating of the Panama treaty became necessary, almost on the same day that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded, when no doubt could exist between the Governments of the United States and the newborn Republic of Panama as to the meaning and application of the terms and stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it was made subject to all the provisions and conditions of that treaty.

Whether it was wise or unwise to have made these treaties, or any one of them, is a question that does not arise in this controversy. The only question to be considered is, Did we make these contracts; and if so, what are our obligations under them?

If Great Britain knew that we did not intend that our coastwise shipping was to be included in and covered by the "equal treatment" provision of the treaty, and did not complain at the time, she would now be estopped from contending otherwise; but, on the other hand, if we had reason to believe that England understood the terms "all nations" to include the United States and its citizens, and we did not disclose to her that in case we became sovereign over the country through which the canal should be constructed that vessels owned by citizens of the United States should be free from toll charges for use of the canal, we can not now in good faith insist on such a construction of the treaty.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind it is inconceivable that if those engaged in the coastwise shipping of the United States at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated understood that their ships were not included in the "equal treatment" terms of the treaty and were not subject to toll charges by reason of that provision, that they remained silent for more than nine years.

The very fact that the coastwise shipping interests of the country made no claim of this kind pending the negotiation of the treaty, or subsequent thereto, is the highest circumstantial evidence that they did not so understand the terms of the treaty themselves. But it is still more remarkable that upon the negotiation of the treaty with Panama, by which the United States, for the purposes of construction and operation of the canal, became the sovereign of the Canal Zone territory, that our domestic shipping interests did not immediately proclaim to the world that by the terms of the Panama treaty preferential treatment was accorded them in the adjustment of toll charges. But, so far as I now recall, I never heard that any such claim was being made by our coastwise shipowners until Congress undertook to provide for the civil government of the canal and fix the tolls to be paid by vessels passing through it.

It seems to me that it would be highly dishonorable on our part to contend for a construction of the treaty which, if contended for at the time, would have prevented the making of the treaty, nor do I think that we, in honor and good conscience, have any rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that England would not have had had she constructed the canal under that treaty instead of ourselves. Now, does it stand to reason that if England was in our shoes that we would admit that the terms of that treaty would permit England to send the vessels of its citizens through the canal free of charge whenever engaged in commerce exclusively between Great Britain and her numerous colonies, while demanding a toll charge for all vessels of citizens of the United States engaged in the coastwise traffic? Why should not nations as well as individuals be governed by the Golden Rule? But, for the sake of argument, let it be admitted that under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we can pass our coastwise vessels through the canal without charge; would it not be a foolish and unwise policy for us to do so in the face of the charge and belief by all other nations of the world that such action was unfair and discriminatory as to all other users of the canal? How are we to build up our foreign trade if we at the same time so demean ourselves toward them as to give them just cause to complain that we are a selfish and greedy nation; that we are a driver of hard bargains; that we are narrow, illiberal, and picayunish? Much of the foreign commerce of the world is so situated as to make the Suez and the Panama Canals competitors. Now, why should we give our own monopolistic coastwise shipping a free service through the canal over the protests of all other nations when no such a course is pursued with reference to the Suez Canal, the policy of which is largely dominated by Great Britain, and especially when our treaty provides that the rules of the Suez Canal, as to conditions and charges of traffic, shall be the rules of the Panama Canal? Does it not stand to reason that in such portions of the world where other nations may use either of these canals that they will prefer Suez to Panama?

Mr. Speaker, there is a much greater portion of the commerce of the world that by reason of natural conditions on equal toll charge and equal treatment will go through the Suez Canal; but with the discriminating, unjust, and preferential treatment shown by the United States to the owners of vessels in the coastwise trade, will it not tend to cause the nations of the world to prefer the Suez Canal to even a greater degree than they otherwise would?

I can not bring myself to any other conclusion than that our policy is shortsighted and on the whole very injurious to our country in its efforts to build up our foreign commerce. Even though there should be no question as to our right under the treaty to pursue such a course, a legal right to do a moral wrong does not make it wise to do such a wrong.

Mr. Speaker, is it reasonable to suppose that the great masses of the people are going to believe that the President of the United States, who has direct charge of the enforcement of all our treaties with foreign countries, is going to surrender the rights of the American people, whose trusted representative he is, by accepting an erroneous construction of a treaty upon the unwarranted demand of any one or of all foreign nations? Would not any President this country has ever had or ever will have hesitate long before being guilty of such cowardly and treasonable conduct toward the citizens of his own country? And yet such is the charge that is being made every day against President Wilson, and it is humiliating and mortifying to know that members of his own party are guilty of making this charge. For one, I do not believe it, and if I did I would feel that I was a moral coward if I did not immediately ask for his impeachment by the House of Representatives. If our President is as bad a man as these charges would make him, no self-respecting Member of the House so believing can ever again cross the threshold of the White House even to pay his respects to the present President of the United States, for certainly, Mr. Speaker, no man worthy of a seat in this House could have any respect for President Wilson while entertaining such an opinion of him.

The perpetuity of our institutions depends upon the confidence in and respect for the agencies of our Government, selected by the people to do their will, and whenever the people of the United States lose confidence in the honor and integrity of public officials our form of government will be immediately abolished.

Mr. Speaker, it is being charged and stoutly maintained that to pass this bill is to violate the Democratic platform of 1912—exempting American ships engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of canal tolls. That such a paragraph appears in the platform all must admit. This paragraph is part of the declaration of the party as to its position on the proper method of building up an American merchant marine. The major premise or leading and dominating paragraph with regard to the merchant marine is as follows:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister republics of the South, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the public treasury.

So it must appear that it is impossible to carry out the purposes of the exemption paragraph without rendering nugatory the dominating and controlling preceding part of the platform—prohibiting the use of bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury for the fostering of a merchant marine. In construing an instrument every part of it must be considered, and especially with regard to conflicting clauses or paragraphs in the same instrument, and in all such cases the entire context of the instrument must be examined and a fair and reasonable construction placed upon every paragraph, as the same may or may not agree with the entire instrument, and especially so with reference to the context bearing upon a special subject matter of the instrument in which the conflicting paragraphs are found. The toll-exemption provision is a minor paragraph of that part of the platform giving expression to the Democratic position as to the means to be used in building up our merchant marine, and the exemption paragraph being subsequent to the major or controlling paragraph can not be accepted as of greater weight or as of equal weight with the major or controlling paragraph by which every subsequent provision in the platform must be determined.

In aid of arriving at a proper construction of the exemption paragraph much light is shed upon the question under consideration by reference to the party's position on the subject of a merchant marine in the platforms of 1904 and 1908. In the platform of 1904 we find the following paragraph:

We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine, without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Treasury.

In the platform of 1908, upon the merchant marine we find the following plank:

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

So, Mr. Speaker, in construing the exemption clause by the Democratic platforms of 1904 and 1908, as well as 1912, we find that any attempt to build up the merchant marine by imposing new or additional burdens upon the people or by the use of bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury is positively, unequivocally, and absolutely prohibited. Therefore, if the toll-exemption clause adds to the burdens of the people, it is specifically in violation of the platform in which it is found, as well as the two preceding platforms which I have just read. The maintenance and upkeep of the canal, and the operation of the same, must either be paid for out of the Public Treasury or collected in the way of tolls from those who use the canal. There is no sort of contention that any toll charges that will not be prohibitive on all vessels going through the canal, including those in the coastwise trade, will afford a sufficient fund to pay the current expenses and charges incident to the maintenance and operation of the canal, its sanitation, and defense for many years to come, and that there will necessarily fall upon the people a burden to the extent of the deficit that will be required for the purposes just expressed in the way of public taxation, which burden is entirely new, and will be largely augmented if this bill is not passed.

Therefore the free-tolls paragraph as to American coastwise shipping can not be put into practice without being in direct conflict with the prohibitions and inhibitions specifically provided for in our three last national platforms. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there can not be a particle of doubt that the free-tolls clause found in the platform of 1912 is in direct conflict with and renders nugatory the preceding specific limitations upon the methods to be used in building up a merchant marine in our present and two preceding platforms.

But, Mr. Speaker, who is to decide as to the proper construction of apparently conflicting paragraphs of our party platform? As to the construction and meaning of our national platform, the President of the United States is the court of last resort, and his decision on such questions is final and unreviewable, and in this sense is infallible. No other position is tenable.

If every member of a political party is at liberty for himself and of himself to determine what each clause or paragraph of a platform means, with no higher authority to pass on the correctness of his views, what is a platform worth? Who is the highest political authority to whom an appeal can be taken until another national convention meets and a new platform is adopted? The President of the United States is now the highest authority upon his party platform's construction, however much he may be mistaken in his construction. Many of you believe the Supreme Court of the United States has been mistaken, and that the supreme courts of your own States have been mistaken. But the law-abiding citizens of all countries obey and comply with the law as determined by their respective supreme courts. That court may consist, possibly, of a single man. On questions of party doctrine our President is supreme, being the court of last resort; and if we have a right to turn him down, we may refuse to obey the laws of the State or Nation as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States if we differ with the court.

Now, does anybody believe that the President of the United States has not as much interest in the proper construction of our platform as any other living man? He is charged in part with responsibility for legislation to carry it out in the interest of the whole country, and yet gentlemen are heard to say that we are surrendering to a foreign country, and that we are repudiating a plank in the platform in doing so.

Why this contention? Why this determination to destroy this administration by appealing to prejudiced political interest? On the other side are two political leaders, one in charge of the standpat Republican Party and its interests, and the other in charge of an offshoot of that party known as the Progressive Party.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. In view of the statement which you made, that all of the nations of the earth are against the free passage of these American coastwise vessels, I would like to inquire if that is a formal protest?

Mr. SIMS. Who are the parties to the treaty? Why ask a question which means to haggle over terms?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Suit yourself.

Mr. SIMS. I mean this in all good feeling. The gentleman knows that nothing personal is meant. It has been contended that this matter should go to The Hague. Everyone knows now the construction that we place upon the treaty. Almost every man who has written a word in opposition to tolls has claimed that The Hague court could have no jurisdiction. They contend that a question of national honor can not be submitted to the court, but some of our opponents are beginning to think that the right is on our side and are willing to go to The Hague court.

How was this illegitimate free-tolls plank born? Who is its father? How did it get in there? Show me a single State that sent delegates to that convention that gave any instruction as to this question one way or another. State conventions were as silent as the grave. Not a particle of discussion was had before the national convention. I venture to say there were not 50 delegates in the national convention who knew it was in there or that it was contemplated to have such a plank in our platform. It was no more in response to the demand of the people of the several States than it was to the demands of England herself.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. For a moment; yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Did not your Secretary of State prepare that plank in the platform, and was he not responsible for its going into the platform?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know whether he was or not.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And has he not repudiated it now?

Mr. SIMS. I do not care one penny as to that. If he did a thing the people had not authorized to be done, it was null and void.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Can the gentleman point out the planks in the platform that are not bastard planks, according to his definition?

Mr. SIMS. A fair, brown-haired, blue-eyed woman may be lawfully married to a fair, blond-haired, blue-eyed man, and should a child born to them be black and kinky-headed, under the laws it would be legitimate having been born in lawful wedlock, but every layman would know it was illegitimate.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is not the Secretary of State the father of it?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know, nor do I care, who the father was, but I do know it is not of Democratic blood.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen must not sit in their seats and interrupt a Member who has the floor without permission. It is against the rules and in bad form.

Mr. SIMS. In whose interest was this done? The coastwise shipowners, who are largely the railroads on both coasts, but more especially on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, are the only beneficiaries.

In the same act we provided that no railroad company could operate a ship or vessel anywhere on any waterway in competition with itself. The railroads were given until July 1, 1914, to make application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of showing that the vessels owned by them were not competing with themselves. I wrote to the Interstate Commerce Commission to let me know how many applications there were and by what railroads they were made and the number of vessels owned by each road so applying. The reply covers about 15 pages. It is too long to read, but it practically covers our entire coastwise shipping interests. I will file same as an appendix to my remarks. And, strange to say, there are Members of this House who are willing to wreck this administration——

Mr. KINDEL. Are you going to put that report into the RECORD?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; it will be in the RECORD. You propose to wreck this administration with a program of antitrust legislation not yet carried out. The report made recently by Judge ALEXANDER, of this House, one of the ablest and best men in it, chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, shows that 94 per cent of all the Atlantic and Gulf coastwise shipping is owned directly by railroads or shipping combinations. No one will controvert the truth of that report. Will you stand by a plank in the platform that violates every other principle in it, to the end that you may aid the railroads to further operate and control shipping facilities through the canal free? True, the transcontinental railroads can not operate ships through the canal in competition with themselves.

But there is not a railroad in the United States not doing a transcontinental business that is not at liberty to use that canal. We will tax the people, yes, tax the widow and the orphan to furnish a $400,000,000 free-service facility to the railroads, and then have the cheek to claim that we are urging this legislation in the interest of the Canadian Pacific and other transcontinental railroads.

I will tell you whose interest you are serving, whether you do it with or without knowledge on your part. When the canal bill was being considered I put the test to gentlemen in this House who were crying out transcontinental railroads, and they ran away from it like scared rabbits. I proposed to permit foreign vessels to enter the coast-to-coast business through the canal upon the payment of tolls; but no, never. We are not attacking any coastwise shipping. They can continue to go around the Horn, as they have always done. It is to their material and monetary interest to go through the canal, even on payment of the tolls charged, and thus save the expense of sailing 8,000 miles around the Horn. Why should we tax our people to pay for construction, upkeep, and operation for the benefit of coastwise ships? Why did we not give the coastwise vessels the free use of the Panama Railroad? It has been owned for nine years by the United States Government. The recipients of special privilege in this country seem to be so infatuated with the benefits of legislation that upon every opportunity they clamor for it on the slightest pretext. I offered the amendment just referred to, providing that foreign ships should be permitted to do a coast-to-coast business through the canal, paying the tolls. That legislation would add to the income of the canal and give the transcontinental railroads real competition.

I made a 20-minute speech in this House in favor of that amendment when the bill was pending, and how many votes do you think I got for it? Forty-four. A number of them came from the Republican side. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and others voted for it. I did not get more than 25 Democratic votes for that amendment, which would have given real competition to the transcontinental railroads and also to our Atlantic and Gulf coast railroad-owned ships. I introduced the amendment afterwards as a bill, and it was first referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and by the Speaker rereferred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Why do you not advocate its passage if you want to give the transcontinental railroads real competition? No. It is a subsidy to the railroads on the Atlantic and Gulf coast country that you stand for. They can send now all the ships they have or may hereafter acquire, unless this bill passes, through the canal free of tolls. There is nothing to hinder the Steel Trust from putting in a line of ships of its own. There is nothing to hinder the Standard Oil Co. from putting a line of ships through the canal free of expenses as to canal charges. There is nothing to hinder the Beef Trust from putting in a line of ships. None of them would be operating in competition with themselves.

Then why prate about our doing something in the interest of Great Britain? It is a fact that Great Britain has more foreign shipping than we, but we have more coastwise shipping than any country on earth. Does any man contend that the declarations in our party platforms from time to time, in favor of building up our merchant marine, refer to the coastwise trade? No. That trade is already protected by a monopoly of the entire trade, and the different companies do not even make the same ports.

Who are you going to stand by? Are you going to stand by the common people, who pay the taxes; by our President, who will not stultify himself by favoring a plank in the platform that was put in stealthily in the interest of an existing statutory monopoly, and the only one in the United States? Why did you not help me pass my amendment to give foreign vessels the opportunity to use the canal in the coastwise trade when going from coast to coast? Under my amendment they would not touch at any intercoastal point.

Oh, my friends who are so wrought up in the interest of the farmer, our foreign shipping has no free-toll subsidy. Our foreign shipping must pay to pass through the canal. A ship on the Atlantic coast, going through the canal south to the nitrate beds of Chili to bring back fertilizer materials for the farmers of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee, must bear the full toll charge, thereby adding to the expense of the fertilizer, it being a raw material. Yet I hear these gentlemen say they are in favor of the farmer, when the law as it now stands discriminates in its operation against the interests of those for whose interests they profess to be so much concerned.

Why all this outcry about the interests of Great Britain? The United Kingdom, Canada, and Australia take and pay for over $1,000,000,000 of our annual exports, while we take from them a little over $400,000,000 of imports, thus leaving a net balance of trade in our favor with those three British countries of more than $628,000,000; but with all the rest of the world our trade balance is less than $100,000,000. We are expending much money in many other countries in trying to introduce our goods and thus increase our trade with them, with not the slightest possibility of ever having with all the world besides a trade balance equal to that we now have with Great Britain. While this is true, gentlemen here undertake, by prejudice against England, to control votes upon this tolls question by saying we are surrendering to the demands of Great Britain.

Did you ever think that it can never hurt any people or any man or any individual to do the honest, straight, square thing without constraint or compulsion? A demand to speak the truth can hurt no man who would speak it otherwise. We should never have given cause for British demands. Oh, they say, this is a domestic waterway. How domestic? We are to-day the lessees of the Canal Zone. We have to permit the Republic of Panama to carry its traffic through the canal free and pay it $250,000 a year rent for all time to come. Is there any port in the United States for which we pay a rental to a foreign country? Can a tenant deny the title of the landlord from whom he rents? We are, as it were, nothing but tenants. We are sovereign only as to canal purposes in the Canal Zone. As it were, a restricted limited sovereignty.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SIMS. We are simply tenants of a foreign landlord, and a little landlord at that, of our own creation, to whom we pay rent.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman mean to convey the impression that, legally speaking, we are not the owners of the Canal Zone and are mere lessees at the pleasure of the Republic of Panama?

Mr. SIMS. Why should we pay rent?

Mr. HOWARD. I understand that is a bonus.

Mr. SIMS. It is in form and in reality a rental, both in law and in morals.

Mr. HOWARD. We paid them so many million dollars cash, did we not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and $250,000 per annum for all time to come.

Mr. HOWARD. We are to pay them $250,000 per annum in perpetuity?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; we have got to pay it as long as we keep the property. Now let me put a question to the gentleman. How did we get that country? Colombia claims to-day that our Panama treaty is a fraud. Therefore it involves a question of our honor.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

Mr. SIMS. Let me get through with my statement.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]?

Mr. SIMS. Not just now, Mr. Speaker. Now, suppose we should cease to pay that rent, and the Republic of Panama should demand it, and we should say, "We do not owe it to you. You are not a legitimate government; you are of right not sovereign of the Canal Zone. Colombia has never, in morals, parted with her Province, and we will not pay you this rent any longer." If Panama should say, "Let us submit it to arbitration, to The Hague court," and we should say, "No; it affects our honor. We can not submit a question involving our honor to arbitration." That is the position some take as to tolls arbitration.

I can not justify myself in committing a moral wrong by a mere technical, strained construction of an agreement to which I am a party. Shall Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, live up to his oath of office, or live up to a construction put upon a paragraph in the platform which every honest, fair-minded man, not affected by a special interest, admits is a subsidy?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. SIMS. No; not now. Secretary Knox said it was a subsidy. But here is a document that settles it; that is, if anything can be settled when a special interest is involved. Here is a study of this question which, in compliance with a request of Senator O'GORMAN, was made a Senate document—Senate Document No. 19, Sixty-third Congress, first session, A Study of the Tolls Question, by George C. Butte, M. A. Listen to what he says. You free-toll men must accept what your learned advocates say about it. In speaking of this matter he says:

> In the present controversy between Great Britain and the United States it is an important fact that the construction placed by Great Britain upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, if recognized, will result in an unquestionable and an unmixed national profit to Great Britain. On the other hand, it is debatable whether the legislation of the United States, which is called in question, will be a national benefit to the United States. This legislation represents, in its features exempting American vessels from paying canal tolls—is a departure from a long-standing policy in the United States against the granting of subsidies, and, as is well known, it was stubbornly opposed by a large faction in Congress.
> Great Britain has decidedly more to gain by the controversy than the United States has to lose. In fact, voices are not wanting both in and out of Congress demanding the repeal of the subsidy in view of this very inequality of the interests at stake.

Gentlemen who are standing for this free-toll policy admit that it is a departure from our long-standing policy in opposition to a subsidy. Stand up like men and admit you are subsidists.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will stand up. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, you do not have to stand up. Everybody knows you are one. [Laughter.] Everybody knows where the gentleman from Washington stands.

Now, you southern people that are interested in forest products, that are interested in the value of lumber on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, if you give the Lumber Trust, the Weyerhaeuser interests of the West free passage through that canal, lumber on the Gulf and Atlantic coasts will go down from $3 to $5 a thousand. It will affect the price of lumber back from the coast for 500 miles. Yet gentlemen who represent a subsidized and protected monopolistic interest are willing to do it, even if they destroy or damage their own particular industry.

In the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission Mr. Walker, representing the hardwood-lumber interests of the South, said distinctly that even now lumber from Washington is invading southern hardwood markets on the Gulf and Atlantic coasts. Now, you can see why the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] stands where he does. If you give these Weyerhaeusers the privilege——

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly; if he is not a subsidist.

Mr. COOPER. Do I understand that the gentleman is opposed to having western lumber compete with southern lumber?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no; but I am trying to show you what a very foolish thing it is to give the Weyerhaeusers the free use of a Government facility, paid for by the taxes of the people, when to do so reduces the value of the property of millions who pay these taxes.

Mr. COOPER. You are trying to protect the South against the competition of the West.

Mr. SIMS. I am trying to show the people in the southern hardwood country the folly of doing something which will reduce the price of their own products and to submit to being taxed in order to do it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will have to yield to the gentleman. He always acknowledges everything I accuse him of. The gentleman may go ahead.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman on that particular point if he will explain the speech made by the President in August, 1912, when he was a candidate, in which speech he spoke about the free canal being a protection against the transcontinental railroads.

Mr. SIMS. I am afraid the President did not know as much about the effect of it as the gentleman from Washington did at that time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. He evidently does not know now.

Mr. SIMS. He has found out now that your Weyerhaeuser lumber interests will get the free use of a public utility, paid for by public taxation. But let us suppose that he did make that speech. Do you mean to charge that President Woodrow Wilson would take one position before the election and another afterwards about the same thing without new conditions to cause him to do so?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman want an answer to that question?

Mr. SIMS. I do not want a speech, but an answer one way or the other.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It answers itself. He made the speech one way when he was a candidate and he takes another position now when he is President. Does his honor now prevent him from taking the position that he took when he was a candidate?

Mr. SIMS. But the implication is that he took a position prior to the election for the purpose of getting votes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Now, to charge that the President of the United States would take one position before the election to get votes and then take a different position now, while having in his own mind the same convictions which he had then, is unworthy of the respect even of a political opponent, let alone a Democrat. My friends, we are confronted—— [Laughter on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER. You bet you are.

Mr. SIMS. Wait a moment, until you hear what I have to say. I am now talking to Democrats. You can make what fun of it you please to. Do not applaud until I get through, and it will last longer. I say, Democrats, we are confronted with this situation. Are we to leave our own leadership, desert our commander while in batttle and in front of the enemy, march over and take orders from the Republican leader, Mr. MANN, or the Bull Moose leader, Mr. MURDOCK? What are we going to do?

Mr. GORDON. We are going to put it over.

Mr. SIMS. The President of the United States, according to party usage and party custom, is the commander in chief of the party forces of its organization. Will our party leaders under him, gentlemen who hold positions of public party responsibility and public trust at this moment, while we are marching up San Juan Hill in the face of the enemy, at a crisis in the battle—will our Democratic commanders under him with uniforms still on desert the commander in chief and march over to our enemies and surrender their swords to the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Kansas? Will we, of the rank and file, do likewise or will we follow our commander in chief, who leads us in the direction of good conscience and fair dealing, who dares to do the right thing because it is right. I pray you do not desert him in the presence of the enemy when the battle is on, when we are making the final charge, without even changing the uniform of Democracy, all for a little pitiable subsidy, the difference in freight rates between the transcontinental railroads with or without free tolls.

Are you going to do it? We are at the crisis. Under which flag will you march?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The American flag.

Mr. SIMS. Under which flag, Democrats—the flag carried by our commander in chief in this battle or the black and red flags of party destruction carried one by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the other by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. [Applause.]

I want to ask every Democrat in this House before he determines to wreck the fortunes of the Democratic Party, before the program which we promised to carry out is half finished, in order to serve a specially protected monopoly interest, which ought not for one moment to be considered, in such a crisis to rally around our great leader, charge the enemy in front and to our rear, and put to flight their trust and monopoly serving legions. [Applause.]

MARCH 19, 1914.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
